The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate how many vessels are now under construction, of all types and classes.

2. How many officers of each grade or rank would be required to officer vessels now in commission, or that could be put in commission in thirty days.

3. When the vessels now under construction will be completed, ready for commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he would have any objection—if he has, I will not press it—to add to the resolution a statement of the number of officers and men now employed in our Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection whatever.

Mr. HOAR. Let there be added to the resolution the words, "and the number of officers and men on each of the vessels of the Navy of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to the resolution:

4. The number of officers and men on each of the vessels of the Navy of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so amended, in the absence of objection. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an order to print a brief document, of which I have the proof sheets in my hand. It relates to the removal of the seat of government to the District of Columbia. The matter is of great importance, and I trust the order will be adopted.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 extra copies of Senate Document No. 63 be printed and bound in paper for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate—

Mr. VEST. Is morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to state that morning business is concluded.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent to call up a little local bill to extend the time for building a bridge across the Missouri River. The work is suspended for the want of this legislation. It will cause no debate, and it will take but a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. VEST. It is the bill (S. 2284) extending the time for the completion of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by act approved June 3, 1896.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will wait until the resolutions that come over from a former day in the morning hour are passed upon.

Mr. VEST. I understood that the morning business was finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is finished, but there are resolutions coming over from a former day.

Mr. VEST. The bill will not lead to the slightest debate.

Mr. HALE. It is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend to June 3, 1902, the time for completing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as fixed by an act approved June 3, 1896.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] on the 3d instant, which is on the table by agreement, to be laid before the Senate to-day. The resolution, which has been read several times, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution calling on the Secretary of War for certain information relative to the beginning of the war in the Philippines.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota whether he will not consent, as his resolution is to be the subject of debate, to allow the resolution which I introduced, as amended by my colleague [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, to be adopted without delaying that by the necessary debate on his resolution? I am not prepared to speak for anybody, but I think the Senate will adopt that resolution unanimously.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think I can consent to that course, for the reason that if my resolution is defeated I shall want to amend the other resolution and perhaps debate it. Therefore I think the resolutions had better be disposed of in their order.

Mr. President, I have some further remarks that I wish to make upon my resolution, but I will yield now to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who wishes to speak upon the subject, and after he has closed I should like to address the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution introduced by me, with the amendment of my colleague, may stand without losing its place until the disposition of the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota. I do not know but that is the rule now. The colleague of the Chair on my left suggests that is the rule now and that it does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. If it is not reached and debated, does it not go over without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A former presiding officer of the Senate so held. The present occupant of the chair does not find in the rules any place for resolutions other than on the Calendar. The rules ought to be amended if the Senate opposes the present custom. But the Chair will hold, as has formerly been held, that these resolutions will lie until they have had one day in court.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; that is all I ask.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I ask to have read the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] on the 18th day of December with reference to the disposition of the Philippine Islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia, which is on the table.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war—the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

SEC. 2. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to acquire and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

SEC. 3. That the United States, having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful vocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

SEC. 4. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands, and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

SEC. 5. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy, in the judgment of the United States, to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of the islands to their people.

SEC. 6. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through treaties with the leading nations of the world, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire also to have read the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] in regard to the course to be pursued with reference to the Philippine Islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, at the time the treaty between the United States and Spain was pending in the Senate for ratification there were a large number of Senators here who believed it to be the wisest and best policy to insert in that treaty a provision making the same promises in regard to giving free government to the people of the Philippine Islands which Congress had, when the declaration of war with Spain was made, given to the people of Cuba.

Those who opposed that amendment of the treaty insisted at that time that it was important the treaty should be ratified at once in order that that war should cease; that the whole question would be left open to the disposition of Congress thereafter, and that no prejudice would come to those who desired to finally dispose of the Philippine Islands in the same manner which was thought proper in the case of Cuba by the ratification of the treaty of peace. The President himself said that Congress would have entire jurisdiction of the matter; and those who argued against that amendment repeatedly stated upon this floor that when the subject came before Congress the entire question would be open for full discussion.

Now, Mr. President, the time has come when resolutions are presented here representing, I take it, the different views of the people of the United States as to the course to be pursued. And now, when those who believe that the Philippine people should be entitled to the same rights and privileges which we had promised to give to the Cuban people undertake to debate the subject upon the floor of the Senate, we are told that we are aiding those who are in rebellion against the United States; that we are giving aid and comfort to men with arms in their hands, who are shooting at our soldiers, and that we, who opposed from the very beginning the method which has been pursued, are responsible for the death of our gallant soldiers who have fallen or who may fall in those islands. I submit to the Senate and to the people of the United States whether or not this is fair treatment.

I furthermore say that I apprehend that no man imbued with proper principles, who believes that the course proposed by the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana will have the effect eventually to destroy this Republic, who believes that another course should be pursued, will not, I take it, be deterred from expressing that opinion because of such grave charges against him, which are unwarranted by the facts.

These two resolutions, the one presented by the Senator from Georgia and the other by the Senator from Indiana, as I believe, fairly represent the different views of the two great parties throughout the United States of America. The main features of the resolution by the Senator from Georgia will be indorsed and supported by all those who believe we in this country are yet bound by a written Constitution, by all those who believe in the principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence, by all those who believe that we should follow the advice of the fathers of the Republic when they said we should avoid entangling alliances with foreign nations.

On the other hand, the resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana, as I infer from the surroundings, represents the views of the President of the United States and the members of his Administration. I say I assume it represents the views of the President because of the Senator who introduced it, because it has been indorsed by the leading Administration newspapers throughout the country, and because of the countenance, encouragement, and congratulations which were showered upon the Senator from Indiana by high Cabinet officials and others connected with the Administration. I therefore submit that these two resolutions join issue, which is to be submitted throughout the United States to the American people, as to the final disposition of the Philippine Islands.

The resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana asserts, in my opinion, a power as absolute as was ever claimed by the most despotic government the world has ever known. Neither the Czar of Russia nor the Emperor of Germany could claim more absolute power than is claimed in the resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana. He says that those islands shall be controlled as the situation demands. The Congress of the United States are to judge of what the situation there demands, and are then to exercise such control as in their judgment they may think necessary.

We are not to be restrained by the written Constitution of the United States of America; we are not to be handicapped by any rights or privileges which those people may claim. If the situation demands it, under that resolution there is no power which has ever been exercised by the greatest and most despotic government in this world which can not be exercised there. If the situation demands it, we may imprison men for an unlimited time without informing them of the nature of the charges against them; we may inflict capital punishment without confronting them with witnesses, without trial, and without jury.

Louis XIV of France in the very height of his power, when he filled the Bastille with men without informing them of the character of the charges against them, never exercised more despotic power than is proposed to be lodged in the Congress of the United States by the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana. And yet we find men in high position who say that it is "non-sense to call this imperialism." I should like to ask, Mr. President, what is imperialism, if it be not the assertion of a power that we, and we alone, are the judges of what is necessary, and that we will exercise such control as the situation demands?

I assert, then, that that resolution, indorsed by the President of the United States and by the members of this Administration, if it is to be the policy to be pursued, is imperialism, absolute and unconditional. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I am unalterably and forever opposed to any such assertion of power by the Government of the United States. I believe we are restrained by a written Constitution, which we have sworn to support, and I believe that the happiness of this people will be best secured by following that Constitution.

But, Mr. President, let us see what arguments are brought forward to sustain the position which has been taken, so different from those which have controlled the Republic in all of its past history; let us see what reasons are given by those who advocate such a policy as to why we should depart from the principles laid down by Jefferson and the founders of the Republic. There are but two main reasons I have ever heard given; and yet, Mr. President, they are not good reasons. The same reasons that are given today why we should pursue this course of conduct in the Philippines have been given, I think, by every government in the history of the past which has sought to acquire additional territory by force of arms, or sought to crush out the liberties of another people. The reasons given in this case, I say, have been given in every case where governments have sought to gain territory by force and without right and without justice.

The first of these reasons is that it is the will of the Lord, that the Lord has selected certain persons as trustees. To use the exact language of the Senator from Indiana, "He has selected them as trustees under Him, and has marked them as His chosen people hereafter to lead in the regeneration of the world."

Mr. President, when an American citizen has such confidence in his own ability and in his own judgment as to believe that the Lord has selected him to do the identical things which the Lord has said shall not be done, I realize that that man is in a condition of mind incapable of judging impartially. When men assume that they are trustees of the Lord to violate His written word I want some testimony besides their own assertion that they have any such trusteeship.

The Good Book of the Lord says, "Thou shalt not kill;" "Thou shalt not steal;" "Thou shalt not bear false witness;" and yet men will come and say that the Lord has made them His trustees to commit every one of these acts upon which he has put the seal of His condemnation. And I say they are mistaken about their appointment.

As I said, Mr. President, this is not the first time this power has been claimed. If I correctly remember history, when Mohammed sought to conquer the entire world and impose his peculiar religious views upon all people, his soldiers went to battle with the cry, "There is but one God and Mohammed is His prophet." And when they murdered helpless women and children they said, "It is the will of the Lord; it is the will of the Lord."

When the Spanish Government was at the height of its power, when those who ruled it argued that it was necessary that they should expand their territory in order that they might grow and live, they sent Cortez to Mexico and Pizarro to Peru, where their paths were marked by death and desolation, by burning houses and murdered women and children, and yet they claimed this was all done in the name of the Lord, though its real object was to increase Spanish commerce and to pour wealth into the lap of the Spanish nation.

So, Mr. President, it has been everywhere, and it is even so today. I think that I have read somewhere that the Emperor of Germany asserts that he is the head trustee, representing the Lord in the regeneration of the world. Those are the kinds of arguments which are urged upon us to induce us to violate the Constitution of the United States, to induce us to trample on every precept of our fathers, to induce us to do an act indeed which, in my opinion, no time can ever cure and which will eventually destroy the very foundations of the Government itself. I deny the authority of those who claim such a trusteeship. I call for the proof of the appointment of these pretended trustees. I say such a trusteeship does not exist, for it would be folly to argue that a man who does wrong is following out the precepts of Him who taught us that order and truth and justice were the great virtues of mankind.

Mr. President, what is the other argument? It is that these men are trustees for the regeneration of the world, and they also claim that it will pay to do that work; that it will bring wealth into the lap of this nation; that it will increase our commerce and open the ports of China to us; that if we pursue such a course the country will grow greater, and stronger, and richer. I deny that proposition. It is true that such a course may bring wealth to some individuals, but I deny that it will bring wealth and prosperity to the great body of the American people. And yet the argument has been used recently, and an appeal has been made to the people of the Southern States especially, that if we adopt the policy of controlling by absolute force and power the Philippine Islands, denying them the right to govern themselves, which we promised to the people of Cuba, it will tend to increase the commerce of the South; that our citizens engaged in the growing and manufacture of cotton will have additional markets for their products and thus the price of cotton will be increased.

Mr. President, I assert here to-day that if we should adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia, immediately throughout the archipelago we would be granted every right, every privilege of commerce that we can secure by force; that those people would be glad to yield to us all rights in the way of coaling and naval stations we may desire; that they would be glad to grant us the privileges of free trade as to the importation and exportation of goods, and that there is no advantage in the way of commerce which would not come with additional force if we should make this peaceful and just and fair settlement with the Filipinos.

On the contrary, so far as the cotton spinners of the South are concerned, it seems to me that if we are to wield absolute power in the Philippines, the great trusts of the United States, the men of wealth, the men who have urged the President to this un-American course which he has pursued, would by their combined wealth and direct taxation in the Philippines secure labor at a cost of 10 cents a day, erect cotton factories there, secure special privileges from the governor-general, and thereby competing with the people of the South in the price of cotton goods, absolutely putting cotton at ruinous prices. There is no difficulty there, I am told, in getting any amount of labor at 10 cents a day. If laborers there should ask more than 10 cents a day, the governor-general whom you send there with this unlimited power would no doubt use such power to fix such price as he should choose. Oh, but you may say, this will not be done.

I state, Mr. President, that under the resolution of the Senator from Indiana it can be done. We have been before told where unlimited power was sought that it would never be used. Away back in the days of 1868, when there were Senators on this floor who urged that reconstruction measures should be passed, we were told that American citizens would never abuse such power. Senators then contended that if the power was given they feared it would be used. The power was given, and we all remember the abuse which followed. For four years robbery, oppression, and every form of injustice prevailed to such an extent that it shocked the civilized world and brought a stain upon the American name. To tell me that if you grant absolute power unrestrained by the Constitution your governor-general and your carpetbaggers sent to distant islands will never abuse that power is to tell me what I do not believe.

But, Mr. President, whether it would pay in the South or not, I have such confidence in the Southern people that I believe the first question they will ask will be, "Is the policy just? Is it fair?" They will not, in my judgment, consider for one moment the benefits which may come to them until they have first determined whether the course proposed is in accordance with the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States and is right in itself. It has been the pride and the glory of the Southern people from the time this Government was organized to hold liberty, truth, and justice far above all money consideration.

Mr. President, if you ask the Southern people to use force to strike down the liberties of the Philippine people, to deny them the right of self-government, they will not forget that in the great contest with the United States in the civil war nineteen-twentieths of those who fought in the Southern army did not fight to extend and perpetuate slavery, but they fought for the rights of home rule and local self-government, because they believed those rights were guaranteed to them by the Declaration of Independence. Therefore, I trust that that people will not recede from the high and lofty position which they have always taken, and that they will contend that truth and justice and honor are still to stand far above the personal gain that you hold out to them in such glittering generalities.

As I have stated, Mr. President, these are the two main arguments which have been used why the policy should be pursued which the Administration seeks to justify. Let us see for a moment. I promise to be brief in that regard. What are the facts which led us to the present situation? Some three hundred or more years ago—I do not recall the exact time—Spain by her arms had conquered the inhabitants of the island of Cuba and of the Philippine Islands. She has exercised over them since that time a colonial government; she has ruled them precisely as the present Administration proposes to rule the inhabitants of the Philippines to-day; she has given them the most cruel, the most oppressive government under which any people have ever lived.

From time to time in desperation the people of those countries sought to throw off the Spanish authority and to win the liberties to which all people are entitled. Once or twice, when victory was almost within their grasp, the promises of Spain for better government, for autonomy, for home rule and local government, induced the people to lay down their arms, and just as regularly as they did so Spain forgot her promises, and no reform was ever made. This had gone to such an extent that in 1898, after some three years of insurrection in the Cuban Isle, when the outrages perpetrated by the Spanish soldiers were so great, and the sufferings of starving women and the starving children were depicted in the Senate and throughout the United States, the American people rose almost as one man and said that these outrages right under the shadow of our flag should continue no longer; they said that Spain must withdraw her power or war would result.

Mr. President, so particular and so cautious were the people of the United States that they should not be misunderstood, that they might not be accused of improper motives in the declaration of war made by Congress, any disposition was disclaimed to acquire territory, and there was also disclaimed any selfish purpose on the part of this Government, basing its action upon the broad ground of humanity, to enable the oppressed people of Cuba to secure to themselves the best possible kind of government, and that they should be free and independent; and I assert to-day that while the Philippine Islands were not named in that resolution, this Government is in honor bound to give them the same free government that we promised Cuba.

What was the result? Our young men in every part of the country rushed to arms with an enthusiasm and a patriotism which has never been excelled, and the glorious victories in the harbor of Manila and the harbor of Santiago and on the hills of San Juan showed what a great and free people could do when they were actuated by disinterested motives and only sought to relieve the oppressed of another country.

What was the condition at that time of the people of the Philippines? They, too, had sought liberty, they had been on the verge of victory, then promises were made to them, and they laid down their arms; but when the people of those islands heard that this great Republic, which desires that all people shall be free, was at war with their long-time oppressor, I can imagine the joy that thrilled the hearts of the people throughout the entire islands when they heard that Dewey had destroyed the naval power of their oppressor in the harbor of Manila.

There was not more rejoicing throughout the United States of America than there was throughout the Philippines. They hoped the time would come when their long-sought-for liberty and independence would be within their grasp. If they had had any doubt before, when Admiral Dewey put their exiled leaders at Hongkong upon American ships and brought them back with others to the islands, placed arms and ammunitions and supplies in their hands, their breasts were so full of hope that within a few weeks they rallied with such enthusiasm as to drive the Spaniards from every province except that of Manila.

They were only prevented from taking it by the advice of the American commanders. Knowing that we had promised the Cuban people that they should be free, knowing that they had aided us and that they had been our allies in the contest with the Spaniards in Manila, can you imagine that they did not expect and believe that the same treatment would be given them? And when it began to dawn on their minds that there was doubt about it, naturally, having dealt with Spain, they became uneasy and suspicious. They sent a man here to see the President of the United States, to offer this Government any kind of concession that it might demand. He came here in good faith, and yet the President refused even to give him audience. Not only that, but the Administration newspapers of this city denounced him as a spy and threatened to have him court-martialed and shot if he remained in the country. Finally he fled to Canada, and from there to England or France or to some other country.

Mr. President, not only this, but when the Peace Commission met at Paris, then, for the first time, it was given out that it was the intention of the United States to purchase and permanently hold the absolute sovereignty of those islands. Then it was, after the treaty was signed, but before it was ratified by the Senate, that the President of the United States issued that unfortunate proclamation of December 28, known as the benevolent assimilation proclamation. Bear in mind that this was done before the Senate had agreed to the treaty; that it was done at a time when we were seeking to get an amendment on the treaty, making the same promise to the Philippines which we had made to Cuba. He then put forth that declaration which claimed absolute sovereignty for the United States, and notified them that we would take possession of the islands. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], a few days since, furnished the absolute and incontrovertible testimony that it was that proclamation which brought on the clash of arms and which has caused all the suffering. So certain was General Otis that it would cause bloodshed that he struck out portions of it, but the Filipinos secured a copy of the original.

I assert here to-day that if the President had stated in his proclamation that he had no doubt Congress would grant them the same rights and privileges that we had promised Cuba, there would never have been a gun fired, and all this expenditure of money and all this loss of life of our best and our bravest soldiers would have been avoided. It came from that proclamation. There the responsibility rests, and there is no power to relieve those of it who are responsible for it. I will do the President the justice to say that I do not believe he did it willingly. I believe that he yielded after long pressure, after the persuasion and importunity of those who sought this mode of procedure for commercial speculation for themselves, and that the President of the United States only yielded after they had made him believe that a majority of the people of the United States approved that course.

But, Mr. President, he did yield, and the responsibility rests upon him and those who induced him to issue that proclamation, and not upon the men who tried to avoid it. I do not think it is either brave or manly or truthful for those who are responsible for the issuance of that proclamation, and who refused to grant the people of the Philippines the same rights we had promised to Cuba, to come here "howling like slaves whipped to their burden," and say, "You all did it because you opposed our course." If I had believed that I was a trustee under God to bring more wealth to this nation and my advice had been followed, I never would have come back and sought to avoid all responsibility and to charge upon the men who had used every effort to secure a peaceful settlement that they were chargeable with the death of our soldiers.

But that is the condition presented to-day. Mr. President, it is not yet too late. It is too late to save the lives of the brave Lawton and many others who have fallen there; it is too late to call back the expenditure of money; but it is not too late for this great and free Government of ours to disclaim responsibility for these wrongs and to do that which is right. If we to-day, followed by the House of Representatives and the President, would adopt the resolution proposed by the Senator from Georgia, I assert that not another gun would be fired in the archipelago.

I believe we should do an act which would place this great Government upon the highest pinnacle of fame. We stand to-day equal or superior to any other nation in the world. There is no human being who could claim that in doing this act of justice we are actuated by any motive except an honest one, or that we right the wrong which has been done through fear. We are the absolute masters of the situation. If, occupying that position, we rise to the necessities of this great occasion and assure these people that they shall be free, we will prove to the world that we were honest when we said that we went to war not for conquest, but in order to give freedom to others. I assert that if we should do that we would command the respect of every nation in the world and deserve the love and admiration of our own people.

But we are told it is too late. We are told again and again that the majority of the people of the United States have approved the policy of the President. Mr. President, I do not know how that is. Neither do the men know who make the assertion. I believe that if to-day a vote should be taken on these resolutions, disconnected from party politics, removed from all the great questions which divide the two political parties, if it could be submitted fairly to the country, an overwhelming majority would declare in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia. We know that an overwhelming majority of the Democrats in the country are in favor of it. We know that the great body of our German and Irish American citizens are in favor of it. We know that the laboring people from one end of this country to the other indorse it and favor it, and that the great organization known as the Federation of Labor, said to represent 800,000 workingmen, but recently unanimously indorsed it.

We know, too, that there are thousands of Republicans who believe that the course of the Administration is inexcusable and unjustifiable, but their party allegiance and other great questions which are involved in the contest between the two parties prevent them from saying so. If anyone passes an opinion that a majority of the people of the country favor the President's policy, I say he does not know, and I do not know, but I believe a majority of the people of America believe in honor and justice, and I think I know that honor, good faith, and justice demand that we should give to these people the same freedom that we have promised to the people of Cuba. I believe that the future hope and prosperity of this country depend upon pursuing the course laid down in the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia, and whether a majority be for it or against it, speaking for myself and believing that the honor of the Republic in which we live is involved, believing that no other course which we can pursue is honorable, no power on this earth could make me support resolutions of the character offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] or pursue the course advocated by the Administration and a large number of Republicans throughout the country.

But, Mr. President, when all other arguments fail, when those who favor these un-American and unconstitutional methods can find no other words, they fall back and say that wherever the flag once floats there it shall stay. It seems to me that the men who made this Government great in the past, that our ancestors who wrote the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, would answer that proposition and say that if the American flag can not float at any particular point in honor it had best not float at all. But I think I will answer this last argument in the language of a prominent lawyer in my own State, who but a few days ago said that "those who seek to raise the American flag above the crushed liberties of another people have already begun to haul it down from the Capitol of their own country." Such is my belief, and, believing so, I trust that whatever feeling may have been engendered in the past in regard to this matter, the calm and deliberate judgment of the Senate will be brought to the consideration of these resolutions.

I believe with the Senator from Massachusetts that it is the most important question which has confronted the American people for a century. I believe upon this action will depend, in a large measure, the stability of the Republic in which we live, and I trust, then, without feeling, without party prejudice, the Senate will rise to the high position which it has occupied in the past and will reaffirm the declaration laid down when we declared war against Spain, that we did not fight for conquest, that we fought to liberate the distressed and give them a free government, and having planted ourselves upon that high doctrine, that we will not place a stain upon the fair name of this Republic by using the power which has come to us from a war begun for freedom to wrong and oppress another people.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I did not at this time intend to address the Senate at length upon this subject, for I had expected that the resolutions of inquiry which I had offered would be adopted and the information thus furnished from official sources before the debate commenced. But the discussions which arose and the impressions which were made seem to have precipitated a general discussion of the question. I shall begin my remarks to-day by reading from one of Lincoln's speeches the following paragraph:

Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under the rule of a just God can not long retain it.

I believe that is true. I believe the reflex action upon our own people of the conquest of other peoples and their governments, against their will, will gradually undermine free institutions in this country and result in the destruction of the Republic. What are the arguments urged why we should force a government upon the people of the Philippines? The President of the United States says they are not fit for self-government. From my observation of history I believe there are no people fit for any other form of government. Governments are instituted, not bestowed, and therefore derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Any nation of people are capable of maintaining as good a government as they are entitled to have, and when they can maintain a better government they will evolve it, and you can not give them a better government than they can maintain for themselves. A form of government is the result of the social compact, and therefore the government of a people will be as good as the average of the individuals composing the community are willing to have. The American Indians maintained a government, and for them a better one than we have been able to bestow upon them. The Esquimos in the arctic region maintain a government of their own, suited to their condition and their circumstances, and it is a better government than anybody else can give them. Would their condition be improved by sending to them foreign governors and a foreign council to enact laws and direct their course and method of life, to guide them in their civic and civil affairs? So with every other people the world round. There is nothing in the history of the colonies of the so-called Christian nations of the world to encourage the idea that we can give to this people a better government than they are able to maintain themselves.

The old doctrine of the divine right of kings, of the hereditary right to rule, is a doctrine that we disputed and controverted when we established our Government and when we announced the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence. So proud have we been of that discovery that each year we have celebrated the birth into the world of a new theory a new doctrine with regard to governments; and four hundred constitutions have been framed after ours. So powerful has our example been throughout the world, that nation after nation struggling to be free has adopted our form of government.

No nation, no people, in all time and in all history ever impressed such a powerful influence upon the human race as this Republic, and for this reason alone. Empires have been established, a trail of blood has been drawn across the world, and vast aggregations of people have been brought under the rule of an emperor or a monarch since history began, but no people, no nation, in the history of the world has ever produced such a powerful effect for good upon the human race as this great Republic, and simply because of the doctrine laid down by our forefathers in the Declaration of Independence.

Is it an old doctrine that all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed? Some have said that it was a nursery rhyme sung around the cradle of the Republic. The doctrine is new. It was announced but a century ago, a day in the birth and life of nations, and yet this great Republic, boasting as we have on each recurring celebration of the event, proposes now to abandon it for the old doctrine and the old theory and the old idea of selfishness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] says that the Declaration of Independence does not contemplate that all governments must have the consent of the governed; that only those must have the consent of the governed that we think capable of self-government. Under that theory no people in the world are capable of self-government unless they first get our consent that they are fit to give their consent to a form of government which they wish to set up. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says that governments derive their just powers from the consent of some of the governed. Thus the Senator from Indiana would extend the doctrine of imperialism to whole nations of people, while the Senator from Connecticut would extend the doctrine of imperialism to every nation and every people, for he declares that the consent of some of the governed only is required.

Thus we drift back to the divine right of kings, to the doctrine that those who govern shall determine who of the governed shall give their consent. Thus construed, our glorious Declaration becomes a mockery and a fraud. Therefore, when we meet each year to celebrate the instrument's birth into the world, the orators of the Republican party will have to explain its meaning and tell the multitude that our notions, our opinions, of the Declaration have been wrong for a hundred years.

Lincoln, in his speech at Springfield, on June 26, 1857, thus defined his notions of the Declaration of Independence:

In those days our Declaration of Independence was held sacred by all and thought to include all; but now, to aid in making the bondage of the negro universal and eternal, it is assailed and sneered at, and construed, and hawked at, and torn, till, if its framers could rise from their graves, they could not at all recognize it. All the powers of earth seem rapidly combining against him. Mammon is after him, ambition follows, philosophy follows, and the theology of the day is fast joining the cry.

I think the authors of that notable instrument intended to include all men; but they did not intend to declare all men equal in all respects. They did not mean to say all were equal in color, size, intellect, moral developments, or social capacity. They defined with tolerable distinctness in what respects they did consider all men created equal—equal with "certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This they said, and this they meant. They did not mean to assert the obvious untruth that all were then actually enjoying that equality, nor yet that they were about to confer it immediately upon them. In fact, they had no power to confer such a boon. They meant simply to declare the right, so that the enforcement of it might follow as fast as circumstances should permit.

They meant to set up a standard maxim for free society, which should be familiar to all, and revered by all, constantly looked to, constantly labored for, and even though never perfectly attained, constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people of all colors everywhere. The assertion that "all men are created equal" was of no practical use in effecting our separation from Great Britain, and it was placed in the Declaration not for that but for future use. Its authors meant it to be, as, thank God, it is now proving itself, a stumbling block to all those who, in after times, might seek to turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism. They knew the proneness of prosperity to breed tyrants, and they meant when such should reappear in this fair land and commence their vocation, they should find left for them at least one hard nut to crack.

It seems to me that Lincoln, with his prophetic vision, must have seen this day, when prosperity, breeding tyrants, should undertake to declare that the Declaration of Independence no longer applies to anybody but the people whom we decide are capable of self-government. It stands to-day as a stumbling block; it is the hard nut to crack that the imperialists of this country find on this occasion, and it will confront them in this contest on every stump and on every platform in the land. Now, let us see what Stephen A. Douglas in that controversy said about the Declaration. I believe my imperialist friends must have been reading Douglass' argument. Said Lincoln:

I have now briefly expressed my view of the meaning and object of that part of the Declaration of Independence which declares that "all men are created equal."

Now let us hear Judge Douglas's view of the same subject, as I find it in the printed report of his late speech. Here it is:

"No man can vindicate the character, motives, and conduct of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, except upon the hypothesis that they referred to the white race alone, and not to the African, when they declared all men to have been created equal—that they were speaking of British subjects on this continent being equal to British subjects born and residing in Great Britain—that they were entitled to the same inalienable rights, and among them were enumerated life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Declaration was adopted for the purpose of justifying the colonists in the eyes of the civilized world in withdrawing their allegiance from the British Crown and dissolving their connection with the mother country."

Lincoln says:

My good friends, read that carefully over some leisure hour, and ponder well upon it; see what a mere wreck, mangled ruin, it makes of our once glorious Declaration.

"They were speaking of British subjects on this continent being equal to British subjects born and residing in Great Britain."

Why, according to this, not only negroes, but white people outside of Great Britain and America, were not spoken of in that instrument. The English, Irish, and Scotch, along with white Americans, were included, to be sure, but the French, Germans, and other white people of the world are all gone to pot along with the Judge's inferior races.

I had thought the Declaration promised something better than the condition of British subjects. But no; it only meant that we should be equal to them in their own oppressed and unequal condition! According to that, it gave no promise that, having kicked off the King and lords of Great Britain, we should not at once be saddled with a king and lords of our own in these United States.

I had thought the Declaration contemplated the progressive improvement in the condition of all men everywhere. But no; it merely "was adopted for the purpose of justifying the colonists in the eyes of the civilized world in withdrawing their allegiance from the British Crown and dissolving their connection with the mother country." Why, that object having been effected some eighty years ago, the Declaration is of no practical use now—mere rubbish—only wadding left to rot on the battlefield after the victory is won.

I understand you are preparing to celebrate the "Fourth" to-morrow week. What for? The doings of that day had no reference to the present; and quite half of you are not even descendants of those who were referred to at that day. But I suppose you will celebrate, and will even go so far as to read the Declaration.

Why, Mr. President, when we quote the Declaration of Independence or the words of Lincoln, the imperialists of this country say that our words are telegraphed to Manila and give encouragement to the insurgents. If, on the last Fourth of July, I should have read here Lincoln's words, that people who disregarded the rights of freedmen in others can not long retain their own liberty, I suppose Otis would have had me arrested for an insurgent and insisted that I was giving aid and comfort to the enemy; and if I had there read the Declaration of Independence or the words of Lincoln as referring to all people, no matter what their color, I would have been driven from the islands or placed in prison. Has it reached the point that wherever our flag floats men can no longer, without being called rebels, quote from Abraham Lincoln or read the Declaration of Independence. Lincoln goes on to say:

Suppose, after you read it once in the old-fashioned way, you read it once more with Judge Douglas's version. It will then run thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident that all British subjects who were on this continent eighty-one years ago were created equal to all British subjects born and then residing in Great Britain."

Could you make it any more absurd if on the next Fourth of July you should amend it to accord with the opinion of the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Connecticut? Lincoln says:

And I now appeal to all—to Democrats as well as others—are you really willing that the Declaration shall thus be frittered away; thus left no more at most than an interesting memorial of the dead past; thus shorn of its vitality and practical value and left without the germ or even the suggestion of the individual rights of man in it?

On another occasion, in Lincoln's speech in Chicago, Ill., July 10, 1858, he makes this allusion to the Declaration of Independence, and it is so very pertinent to the present occasion and to this debate that I read it as an absolute refutation of the position of the imperialists on this subject.

I might say here, Mr. President, that I allude to those who advocate the conquest of the Philippines as imperialists and not as expansionists, for the reason that expansion implies the enlargement of the same thing, the adding of more of that which you already have, the acquisition of countries holding a population capable of living and supporting our Constitution to be admitted as States into the Union; while the imperialist doctrine is the acquisition of tropical colonies where it is admitted that self-government can not exist, as we understand it under our Constitution; and therefore the people must be governed perpetually and forever as crown colonies of this Republic.

The holding of such countries, the conquest of an unwilling people, their retention in subjugation by a standing army, means of necessity not a republic where all the people must be consulted, but a despotism where the will of one man can march armies, declare war, and act with great rapidity. A republic is naturally slow in action, because the people must be considered and must be consulted.

We have taken on many of the semblances of monarchy and of imperialism in the conduct of this Administration—concealment of facts from the people, denial of news and information, no knowledge of what is going on, no announcement of policy and purpose; and the excuse for it all was that if we should allow the people to know the facts there was danger of creating disapproval of the course of our monarch, and if the enemy should secure those facts it would be of some assistance to them. This is necessary in a monarchy. Press censorship, too, is a necessary adjunct of imperialism, one of the things our forefathers would not have tolerated for a day. And yet our people are becoming so numb that they are willing to accept it, and even criticize men who protest. Lincoln says:

Those arguments that are made that the inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying; that as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow. What are these arguments? They are the arguments that kings have made for enslaving the people in all ages of the world. You will find that all the arguments in favor of kingship were of this class. They always bestrode the necks of the people, not that they wanted to do it, but because the people were better off for being ridden. That is their argument, and this argument of the judge is the same old serpent that says, "You work and I eat; you toil and I will enjoy the fruits of it." Turn it in whatever way you will, whether it comes from the mouth of a king as an excuse for enslaving the people of his country or from the mouth of men of one race as a reason for enslaving the men of another race, it is all the same old serpent—

It is as true to-day as it was when Lincoln uttered it, and it will continue through all time and as long as men struggle for freedom—and I hold if that course of argumentation that is made for the purpose of convincing the public mind that we should not care about this should be granted, it does not stop with the negro. I should like to know if taking this old Declaration of Independence, which declares that all men are equal upon principle, and making exceptions to it, where will it stop? If one man says it does not mean a negro, why not another say it does not mean some other man? If that Declaration is not the truth, let us get the statute book, in which we find it, and tear it out! Who is so bold as to do it?

While Lincoln lived and uttered these words forty years ago, there are men to-day in the Senate of the United States who are so bold as to be willing to go and tear them out.

A voice in the audience said, "No, no." Lincoln then said:

Let us stick to it, then; let us stand firmly by it, then.

Henry Clay took the same view on the subject, and I will read very briefly from what he said:

What is the foundation of this appeal to me in Indiana to liberate the slaves under my care in Kentucky? It is a general declaration in the act announcing to the world the independence of the thirteen American colonies, that "men are created equal." Now, as an abstract principle, there is no doubt of the truth of that declaration, and it is desirable in the original construction of society, and in organized societies, to keep it in view as a great fundamental principle.

But the difference, Mr. President, between the doctrines of the Republican party as founded by Giddings and Hale and Lovejoy and the party of PLATT and BEVERIDGE is not as great as the distance between Lincoln, the first President of the Republican party, whose greatest title is that of the Emancipator, earned by issuing on New Year's Day, 1863, the proclamation of emancipation, and McKinley, whose name must go down in history as the last of the Presidents of the Republican party, and whose chief claim for remembrance will lie in the fact that he restored slavery to our country and that under his Administration, under the protection of our flag—the Stars and Stripes—the slave driver plies the lash to the back of unrequited toil. Lincoln in his emancipation proclamation said:

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are and henceforward shall be free, and that the executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

President McKinley approved the treaty with the Sultan of Sulu, which provides:

ART. 3. The rights and dignities of His Highness the Sultan and his dates shall be fully respected, the Moros shall not be interfered with on account of their religion, all their religious customs shall be respected, and no one shall be persecuted on account of his religion.

And within that clause is embraced slavery and polygamy, both of them religious customs under the practice of Mohammedanism by the Sultan of Sulu.

But further than that, Mr. President:

Article 10. Any slave in the archipelago of Sulu shall have the right to purchase freedom by paying to his master the usual market value.

Nothing is said about where he is to get the consideration. The business of the Sultan of Sulu has been in the past to get into a quarrel with some of the negro tribes of the island of Mindanao, the largest island of the group, having an area nearly as great as the State of Indiana, and then, as an excuse for punishing them for having rebelled against his authority, to take prisoners and sell them as slaves to the planters raising sugar upon the island of Borneo. This is the way he gets money to carry on his business. Yet we have agreed in this treaty, ratified and sanctioned by the President of the United States, that we will not interfere with any controversy which exists between the Sultan and his subjects, but that they shall be tried and dealt with under the laws which he may make.

He is an absolute monarch, having the power of life and death. No one can question his right. If he commands his assistants to assassinate any one of his subjects, no one can call into question the act; yet we make an agreement with him whereby we pay him $250 a month to fly the flag of the United States over his slave ships and over his harem.

ART. 13. The United States will give full protection to the Sultan and his subjects in case any foreign nation shall attempt to impose upon them.

Nobody else. And we have agreed not to again interfere to stop his slave ships or stop the practice of slavery and polygamy in that country. And yet the President says that the Stars and Stripes mean the same thing wherever they float!

Article XIII of the Constitution of the United States provides, in section 1, that:

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President—

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from South Dakota has been twice interrupted by the pending bill when the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived without being able to complete his remarks, and the resolution will come up again to-morrow in the ordinary course of business. I understand the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] is at once prepared to proceed this afternoon. I have a very few remarks to make in answer to the Senator from South Dakota. They will not take more than ten or fifteen minutes, and I should like to ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from South Dakota speaks to-morrow he may proceed to the conclusion of his remarks, and that I may then follow him and make such few remarks as I desire; and that, if necessary, the unfinished business may be informally laid aside until we shall have finished. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. RAWLINS. As far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to defer my remarks until the Senator from South Dakota can conclude, if he desires to do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. How long will the Senator from South Dakota require?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think about twenty or thirty minutes at the outside.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the Senator like to finish now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to finish now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to follow the few remarks of the Senator from South Dakota with a few remarks?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not object if that is satisfactory to Senators.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be better if we put it over until to-morrow, and then we can dispose of the resolution. As the Senator from Colorado wishes to follow the Senator from South Dakota, if permission is extended to the latter to go on now, I think the Senator from Colorado ought to have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think those speeches will close the debate on the resolutions. If the Senator from Colorado replies to the Senator from South Dakota it may provoke more discussion and fuller discussion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like very much to finish to-day.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from South Dakota ought to be permitted to proceed now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that there are several resolutions pending, and if not, it is easy enough to have resolutions pending, I assume.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Dakota may proceed, and that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside—

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not consent to an indefinite arrangement.

Mr. ALLEN. And that the Senator from Colorado be permitted to follow him in remarks which will take ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is all. The only request is for the Senator from South Dakota and myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The President of the United States, in his speech at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., in October last, said:

That from the hour the treaty was ratified it became our territory; there was but one authority and but one sovereignty that could be recognized anywhere in those islands, and it became our duty to restore order, to preserve peace, to protect life and property.

Yet he went to war with the Christian people of that country, with those who believed in the Catholic religion, and made a treaty with the Mohammedans by which they were to set up and maintain their own government almost absolutely independent and free from us. If he had granted to the Christians of the Philippines the same rights he granted to the slaveholders and polygamists of the Philippines, there would have been no war whatever. And yet we, as a great Christian nation, select for self-government the slaveholding Mohammedans, occupying more than one-third of the area of the entire group, and proceed to establish what? Not Christianity, for they are already Christians; but we make the effort to shoot Protestantism into the Catholic population of the rest of the islands.

If our flag floats over that entire region, and if, as the President said, it is absolutely under the dominion and control of the Constitution of the United States, it seems to me that he violated the Constitution when he made the treaty with the Sultan of Sulu, and that he ought to be impeached.

Mr. President, it would be in accord more with my ideas of American institutions if we had gone to the Sultan of Sulu and said, "You must abandon polygamy and slavery, and if you do not do it and recognize the power and authority of the Government of the United States over the whole group of islands under your control we will wage war upon you until you do it," instead of going to the people who had been our allies, the Christian people of the northern islands, and saying to them, "Unless you surrender your constitution which you have adopted, and which is framed after our Constitution, unless you surrender your right as a government of a free people, we will proceed to kill you until you do." Instead of drawing a trail of blood over those islands, where the population can read and write, where they have embraced the same religion as ours and pray to the same God, it would have been better had we attacked the so-called barbarous people of the southern island.

I might read several other extracts from the President's speech all to the same effect. He has hardly made a speech without an allusion to the flag, until I am almost convinced that he receives his direction from the English minister, for it is the same song always that England sings whenever she proposes to rob somebody. Whenever England concludes to go upon an expedition and plunder some of the weaker nations of the world, she makes her first appeal to patriotism, and then, step by step, goes on until she has committed the wrong, has transgressed, and then declares that the flag has been fired on and that no Englishman must question the right or wrong of what they are doing until the enemy is defeated and the country annexed.

We are pursuing the same course. Our Minister of State was trained in the English school, and he has come home with their ideas and their notions and is going to try their way of humbugging the people of this country as the people of England have been humbugged. You can do it in England, but you can not do it here. More than a million of the people of England do not vote. Most of the population have been degraded by being herded in manufacturing towns until a very large per cent of her population have no property, no capacity, and no opinions except to toady to the aristocracy.

How appropriate, Mr. President, that the restoration of slavery and the new interpretation of the Declaration of Independence should come together. It seems to me, however, that it marks the saddest chapter in the history of that great political organization, the Republican party. It came into being as a protest against slavery, as the special champion of the Declaration of Independence, and it goes out of being and out of power as the champion of slavery and the repudiator of the Declaration of Independence.

The President says that moral reasons compel us to stay in the Philippines, and that we, under God's direction, owe a duty to mankind, and more of similar cant. Here is what John Morley, the English statesman and writer and biographer of Gladstone, says with regard to England's policy in this same connection:

First—

you push on into territories where you have no business to be and, where you had promised not to go; secondly, your intrusion provokes resentment, and, in these wild countries, resentment means resistance; thirdly, you instantly cry out that the people are rebellious and that their act is rebellion (this in spite of your own assurance that you have no intention of setting up a permanent sovereignty over them); fourthly, you send a force to stamp out the rebellion, and, fifthly, having spread bloodshed, confusion, and anarchy, you declare, with hands uplifted to the heavens, that moral reasons force you to stay, for if you were to leave, this territory would be left in a condition which no civilized power could contemplate with equanimity or composure. These are the five stages in the Forward Rake's progress.

There is not a thing there that does not absolutely accord with the excuses given by the imperialists why we should abandon our former form of government and conquer and rule against their will an unwilling people. What blessing has England given to her colonies that has justified this plan throughout the world? Ireland came first, and the persecutions of Ireland were justified on a doctrine of benevolent assimilation—that they were Catholics, and therefore, unless they were converted from Catholicism, they would go to the devil, and it was England's great and grand mission to make them Protestant anyhow. She has succeeded neither in the one nor the other. Her course in Ireland has been one of the blackest pages in the history of the world—starvation and plunder.

If England will govern Ireland as she has done, what right has she to the claim that she can confer benefits upon any country? What is there in England's example that can justify us in undertaking the same work? The miserable, miserable, contemptible rot of Rudyard Kipling where he talks about the white man's burden it seems to me in the light of English history is contemptible—the white man's burden to confer the curses of English rule upon the other nations of the world.

England commenced with Ireland. How is it with India? They have made no converts practically to Christianity in India; neither have the natives learned the English language. None of the people of India talk English. They have to keep an army of 210,000 men to hold them in subjection and prevent them from securing modern arms, modern implements of destruction, while they trample upon their rights as a people. What blessing has England conferred upon India? Nothing but the fact that taking away her food supply has caused the starvation of a million of men in India every year for years, and some years six or seven millions of people in a year. One hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of the food products of India are shipped away to pay pensions in England, and the result is that the want of that food causes the people of India to starve.

Compare the provinces of India that do not recognize English rule, that are under an English protectorate, and you will find that there is no starvation there. The native princes rule, and the people govern themselves, and England simply has a suzerainty over them. There is no starvation in those provinces; the starvation is in the English part of India, where the English system of robbery and plunder holds sway. India gives no money to the English treasury, but India is a field for exploiting private enterprise, and thus further enriching the already over-rich classes that govern the English Empire.

What of New Zealand? Did the conquest of New Zealand confer the blessings of Christianity upon New Zealand? Why, it resulted in the destruction of the inhabitants. To-day a great colony of English people are in New Zealand, but the inhabitants who formerly occupied that land have disappeared as the result of English government.

How is it in Egypt? The Egyptian Government was bad, and bad for the same reason that the English Government was bad; but England went into Egypt to enforce the collection of a usurious debt for money which Egypt never received. England went there to force upon that people a debt which was composed almost entirely of interest at 26 per cent on a small sum of money, until to-day every acre of Egypt that is tillable is taxed $10 a year.

Every man, woman, and child in Egypt of native population, toiling and tilling the soil, is a slave to the English taxgatherer. Three thousand five hundred Englishmen wring the taxes by imprisonment and by the lash from those people, and yet the so-called civilized world looks on with approval. In order to better enlarge their capacity to pay taxes and bear burdens, the English officials have compelled those people to toil in a systematic manner, leaving nothing for themselves but a bare existence and a bare subsistence. So it is everywhere that England has gone.

As I said before, England's first conquest was Catholic Ireland, and the excuse for oppression there was that the Irish were Catholics. How appropriate that in our first act in the drama of imperialism we should undertake the conquest of another Catholic country, should undertake the conquest of the Philippines, and should make the same miserable and contemptible excuse which has justified England's atrocities in Ireland during all time. From the pulpits of this country we hear prayers for our success in order that we may introduce Christianity. Oh, Mr. President, if we are to go to war against Catholics, it is not necessary to go half way around the world to do so. We have more of them at home, although there are 6,000,000 of them in the Philippines.

If these islands were rich in every mineral men desire, if their supplies of gold surpassed those of the Transvaal, if every other metal precious and desirable were in unlimited quantities, if their soil were so fertile that it surpassed even the famous valley of the Nile, if they could produce every comfort with half the effort with which it can be produced elsewhere throughout the world, yet I would oppose the annexation of these islands because it is wrong, because it leaves those who have sneered at us in our claim that we were advocates of freedom a justification for their sneer in the future.

But, Mr. President, I hold that we can not profit from these islands. None of our race live within the Tropics. There is not a colony of our race, the Aryan race, anywhere within 22 degrees of the equator. The men of our race who have been doing a commercial business in Manila do not have their families there. They raise a family of half-mixed natives in Manila and leave their real families at home. So it has been with commercial England through the Tropics everywhere, for you can no more produce a white man, a man of our blood, in the Tropics than you can a polar bear. Climatic conditions place their limits upon men just as firmly as upon plants and upon animals.

You can not claim that our race have not been colonists and that they have not gone forward to plant colonies throughout the world, for they have; but they settle in that belt around the world, between the twenty-fifth and fifty-fifth degrees of north or south latitude.

Jamaica has been an English colony for two hundred years. Jamaica has 4,200 square miles. It lies within the Tropics. It has a population of 633,000 people. How many Englishmen; how many Europeans? Including the garrison, including the officers, including the attachés of the Government, 14,600, and that is all. The rest are blacks. This island lies within the Tropics. It has an elevation of 7,000 feet. It is one of the most healthful of all the tropical islands.

And yet the European will not locate there. He goes to New Zealand, to southern Australia, to Canada. He abides where the frost chills man's blood and where clothing made of the wool of the sheep helps to keep him warm. I think you can lay it down as a proposition which can not be refuted that self-government and independence and high civilization are only embraced by people who find it necessary to wear warm clothes and who feel the tingle of the frost in their veins during a portion of a year.

The Leeward Islands have 701 square miles. They have 123,000 people, 5,000 of whom are Europeans. It is another English colony. These 5,000 are the garrison and the officeholders, with a few traders.

British Guiana, on the north coast of South America, has 109,000 square miles and a population of 280,000 people, which has been doubled in area, I think, very recently—negroes, contract laborers, coolies from India raising sugar, with 2,533 Europeans, including the garrison.

Haiti has a population of 600,000 people. It has 10,204 square miles. The language is French. Nine-tenths of the population are negroes, and the rest are mulattoes. You can say a thousand things about Haiti, about its healthful climate, about its wonderful productiveness, about its desirability. There is not a thing you may say about the Philippines that you can not say about this island with far more truth. White men will not live there because of the climate.

New Guinea, a British colony, lies between 8° and 10° of the equator and has 88,000 square miles.

New Zealand has an area of 104,000 square miles. It is near New Guinea. It is between the thirtieth and thirty-fifth degree of south latitude, and therefore outside of the Tropics. I give this illustration for the purpose of showing that it is a question of climate whether the white race will occupy a locality or not. Its population is 628,000 Europeans, 41,000 natives, and 4,400 Chinamen. It is near New Guinea. It is in the Temperate Zone. So the Anglo-Saxon went there and settled, and he has built up a government, freer, in my opinion, and better than ours, because untrammelled by interference, untrammelled by older influences. This colony was planted later than ours, and, unhindered by greed, by a combination of circumstances which have oppressed us and the English people, the people of New Zealand have worked out what Anglo-Saxon men untrammelled will always work out—a free government participated in by all the people. In my opinion they have better laws. In fact, they furnish about the only example of a first-class English government on the globe to-day.

The Straits Settlements are within the Tropics. There is there a population of 512,000 natives. Singapore, the commercial city, is a great city, one of the emporiums of the East, right under the equator. It is on the route from the Suez Canal to China and Japan. It contains 512,000 natives, 6,500 Europeans and Americans. The Europeans are the English garrison and the English officeholders. The few Americans who are there are engaged in trade and business with the East, and they go away in the summer. They go up to Japan; they go to the health resorts of that delightful country to escape the evil effects of a tropical climate.

It was supposed that the French people would occupy the Tropics, but they do not. The Latin race, more or less, has occupied the Tropics, but the frost of winter has touched the veins of the Frenchman. It has overcome the tendency of his Latin blood to live within the Tropics, and although they have conquered Tonquin, with 9,000,000 people, and Cochin China, with 3,000,000 more, there are only 3,000 Frenchmen in the whole country, including the officers and the garrison. The rest of the troops are natives.

Martinique is an island on the north coast of South America, of which we have heard much of late. Martinique has 187,000 people, and only 1,307 Frenchmen and Europeans of all classes. The balance of the population are blacks.

French Congo has a population of 7,000,000, and only 200 Europeans, besides the garrison.

So it goes the world over. Our people do not go to the Tropics. Our people will not live and raise families in the Tropics.

Mr. President, we are told by the President of the United States and by the orators who favor imperialism that this will be a paying venture—that trade follows the flag. Well, the morality of that argument can be fairly illustrated, I think, in this way: If a boy of a numerous family should cross a wide desert and find at the foot of a mountain an old man with a family of children, possessed of vast wealth in gold, jewels, horses, and cattle, and should return to his brothers and say, "There are nine of us, and I believe, if we go together, we can overturn the old man, who is not fit to bring up those children anyway, and rob him of his wealth, and I think it will be a profitable venture," and they should start out and accomplish that act, it seems to me they would stand upon exactly the same plane as the man who stands upon this floor and advocates taking all the Philippine Islands because it would pay.

But, Mr. President, trade does not follow the flag. If it be true that trade follows the flag, then England's trade with her colonies ought to be a good example and an argument in its favor. That ought to settle the question. Trade follows the best markets, and England's experience is a refutation of the doctrine that trade follows the flag.

Let us see. The total imports to England in 1856 were $860,000,000 from all countries, and from her colonies and dependencies, $215,000,000. England's imports from all countries in 1896 amounted to $2,080,000,000, and from her colonies and dependencies, $475,000,000. Twenty-five per cent of all her imports came from her colonies or dependencies in 1856 and but 22.8 per cent in 1896. After forty years, if trade follows the flag and has such a tremendous influence upon it, the percentage of England's trade with her colonies ought to have increased rather than declined. This is not conclusive, but the other facts taken in consideration with it are conclusive that trade does not follow the flag.

The total exports from England to the whole world and to her colonies in 1856 were $575,000,000, and of this amount to her colonies and dependencies $165,000,000. In 1895 her exports to the whole world were $1,125,000,000, and to her colonies and dependencies $350,000,000.

These figures show that the trade has not increased in proportion to the general increase. In the four years 1856 to 1859, inclusive, the colonies took 32.1 per cent of England's exports, and for the four years 1891 to 1895 they took 32.4 per cent; in other words, there was an increase of three-tenths of 1 per cent of her exports to her colonies during that time, although there were forty years of growth.

Now, let us see how the total trade of her colonies compares with the trade of the colonies with the mother country. In 1856 $340,000,000 was the total value of the exports from the English colonies to all the world, and $215,000,000 of that trade went to England. The per cent of the colonial exports to England was 63.2 per cent of the total trade of the colonies in 1856. How was it forty years thereafter? In 1895 their total trade with all the world was $1,310,000,000, and with England $475,000,000, or 36.5 per cent—instead of an increase, a very great decrease.

Let us see how it is about the import trade. The English colonies imported from all the world $385,000,000 worth of imports in 1856 and $165,000,000 from England, or 42.8 per cent. In 1895 it seems the value of the imports to the English colonies and dependencies from all the world was $1,110,000,000, and from England $350,000,000, or 31.5 per cent.

Thus the imports to the colonies from the mother country had declined from 42.8 per cent in 1856, forty years ago, to 31.5 per cent in 1895, showing that the colonies constantly decreased in the relative amount of their purchases from the mother country. If trade follows the flag, then more and more of their purchases ought to have been, it seems to me, from the mother country rather than a steady decline.

Let us see whether there is any cause why this should be so. We will take the English trade with the United States. In 1856 the total imports into England from all the world amounted to $895,000,000, and from the United States to $170,000,000, or 19 per cent of her total trade. In 1898 England's imports from all the world amounted to $2,055,000,000, of which $330,000,000 were from the United States, or 26.7 per cent of her total trade. In other words, our exports from England had grown from 19 per cent of all England bought to more than one-fourth of all she bought, while her trade with her colonies had continuously declined. Why was this? Not because trade follows the flag, but because trade seeks the cheapest and best market.

It will thus be seen that the increase from the United States is very marked as compared with the trade of England when compared with her own possessions. If we compare the total imports into England from the whole world and the United States for four years from 1870 to 1873 and from 1895 to 1898 we will find that the increase from the United States was very much greater in proportion than the increase of English imports from all countries. In other words, our imports increased 183 per cent as against England's imports from the rest of the world of 121 per cent.

English exports to the United States have declined from 13 per cent of her total exports in the four years from 1859 to 1862 to 9 per cent of her total exports for the years 1895 to 1898, caused by tariff restriction. But if trade follows the flag this tariff restriction which we place upon English goods, thus causing a decrease of imports to this country, certainly ought to have affected their purchases in the direction of her flag, and ought to have been an additional reason and inducement to purchase more instead of less of her colonies, where she could sell and not be restricted by tariff provisions and could bring back cargoes.

From another view of the subject, let us see how England's trade with her colonies and the United States compares with relation to population. From 1892 to 1897 England imported from her colonies $1.25 worth of goods for each inhabitant of those colonies. From the United States she imported goods to the value of $6.68 for every inhabitant of the United States each year. While the United States purchased of England $1.50 worth for each inhabitant, the English colonies only purchased from England $1.02 worth of goods for each inhabitant, purchasing 48 cents' worth for each inhabitant less than we bought from England, even with our purchase of only $1.50 per capita.

So far as the English tropical colonies are concerned, England only sold to them 71 cents' worth of goods last year for each inhabitant in those colonies, and most of that was to supply her own army and her own officeholders, who wanted English goods. Her trade would have been infinitesimal, almost absolutely nothing, with her tropical colonies, except for her army in India of 70,000 Englishmen and her equally great army of officeholders there. So, such an argument is all nonsense. Trade does not follow the flag.

The United States can only secure tropical countries as colonies. As Schurman, our commissioner to the Philippines, said, the Sultan of Sulu and his people would fight, and therefore it was not well to bother with them. So the people who inhabit the temperate zone will fight, and our only place to get a people who are easy to control, a people who will not fight too hard, a people who are not armed with modern implements of war, a people who can be run over with battalions of our troops, is in the Tropics.

How, then, in the light of England's experience, in the light of the fact that England has practically no trade with the inhabitants of her tropical colonies, except the trade that comes from supplying her officeholders and her army, can we expect to have much trade with the people of the Philippines? How are we going to get rich keeping a standing army in the Philippines, so as to make people whose wages are not over 5 cents a day trade with us?

Mr. President, in the Philippines we do not even supply our own army. If trade follows the flag, it seems to me that the trade with our own Army ought to follow the flag. So prone is trade to seek the best markets that our Army is supplied with potatoes and beef and butter and pork from the English colonies; practically none of it comes from the United States.

Our soldiers are clothed by the English contractors at Hong-kong. Only shoes and a few canned goods go from the United States, and the reason they go is because we export shoes and that people everywhere can buy shoes cheaper in this country than anywhere else, thus proving conclusively that trade does not follow the flag, but goes to the best markets. The coal that propels our ships across the Pacific is English coal. We do not even patronize our own coal mines on the western coast. Every vessel coming this way or going that way in passing Nagasaki, takes on a load of English coal. Our transports are chartered by the Government, and, therefore, every transport carries goods from the United States free of cost to the producers. It seems to me exceedingly strange why, if trade will follow the flag, it does not get under the flag and just float over and supply our own army in the tropics.

What is there in the future to warrant us to believe that trade will hereafter follow the flag in the Philippines? I should like to have somebody tell me. We made a treaty with Spain by which we agreed that the Philippines should have the "open door," so that all the world could trade there through all time to come. Therefore we broke down the barriers of protection, abandoned the policy upon which the Republican party has ridden into power for years. We declared that we would have the "open door," thereby destroying absolutely all hope of any trade in the future with the people of the Philippines, for, under the decisions of our Supreme Court, we can not impose a tariff on their products unless we amend the Constitution.

So their products will come to us free of duty. The tobacco made into cigars by the nimble fingers of those capable Malays will close the tobacco and cigar factories of this country and drive our labor into other channels of employment. There is no reason why they can not supply unlimitedly the cigars for American consumption. Labor there is cheap, labor is abundant, and New England's money—the vast fortunes of the men who have accumulated by the control of monopolies in our country—will go there to exploit this labor, go there to make cotton goods out of Chinese cotton to be sold in the American market.

Mr. President, I saw a cotton mill in China having 34,000 spindles, a modern mill, with, I think, 2,700 Chinese employees or laborers, every one of them men, full grown. There were no children and no women in that mill, and just one Englishman. Every other employee, every spinner, carder, weaver, engineer, every man running a loom, was a Chinaman; and the average wages—mark that—amounted to $3.50 a month, and they board themselves. Besides, they were paid in silver, in Mexican dollars, equal to $1.75 in our money. Yet the American laborer is invited to compete with 10,000,000 of this kind of labor by annexing the Philippines.

It seems to me the sum and substance of the whole scheme is to find a field where cheap labor can be secured, labor that will not strike, that does not belong to a union, that does not need an army to keep it in leading strings, that will make goods for the trusts of this country; and, as the trusts dominated the St. Louis convention and own the Republican party, it is a very proper enterprise for them to engage in.

England has not been enriched by her conquests. To-day, what is the happiest country in the world? It is little Switzerland. Where is there the best distribution of wealth, the best opportunity for man? Where is there the least poverty, misery, and distress? It is in Switzerland, without colonies. It is not in England. Her conquests have bestowed no blessings upon her people. Most of her people have no property; most of the people of England own nothing. Two-thirds of them—66 per cent of them—own nothing, while about 232,000 persons own all the property of Great Britain.

They are the people who exploit the tropical colonies; they are the people who build railroads and charge what they choose, and make loans at usurious interest, thus piling up higher and higher their great aggregations of wealth. Do we want to follow this example? From it no money will come into the Treasury for the benefit of the people of the United States. The laborers of this land, from whom we raise our taxes in the same way England raises hers—by a per capita levy upon consumption—are invited to contribute this taxation to support an army of occupation and subsidize ships to carry the trade in order that those people may be exploited by the trusts of the United States. I do not believe the people of this country will do it.

There is another object. It is well when people become restless, when people become dissatisfied with the conditions which exist, when the toilers of a land begin to believe they are not receiving their just share of the products of their toil, to give them amusement, to distract their attention by distant problems, to do as England has done, begin the killing of men in some distant land, and then appeal to the patriotism of the people and talk about the flag being fired upon in order to take the attention of the people from those great problems the right of solution of which is essential to the happiness of the toilers of the nation.

You ask me what I would do with the Philippines. I would draw our army back to Manila. I would send to the Philippine people assurance that they could set up their own government—a republic, such as they have set up under their constitution, framed after ours, providing, as it does, for universal education, for the protection of life and property, and I would say to the world, "Hands off!" Then I would try to neutralize that country—that is, I would try to make a treaty with the nations of the world by which those islands and their waters should be neutral ground, where any vessel of any country could go and coal and trade—not free trade, if they chose to put up a tariff wall against all the world, but it should be equal to all; but no nation could go there to fight.

I would do what Europe has done with Switzerland and what they have done with the Suez Canal; and if the nations of all Europe would not agree to it, I would say, "Hands off; we will plant a republic on the shores of Asia." The Malay race have shown their capacity for governing in their triumph in Japan. No nation in the world stands higher in the scale of civilization than the Malays of Japan, a kindred race to the people of the Philippines. Give them a chance, and they will plant republican principles on the shores of Asia that will spread to that continent and undermine and overthrow the despotism of colonial rule and the despotism of monarchies.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Dakota would not do that, of course, without the consent of the Filipinos?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, sir; I would not do it without their consent. It seems to me a superfluous question if that is all there is to it.

We are precluded by our Constitution and by the Declaration of Independence and by every claim we have ever made, by every speech of every person who has addressed a Fourth of July audience, from buying sovereignty over a people without their consent first obtained. Purchasing sovereignty and transferring from one nation to another the rights of their fellow-men is simply a species of slavery. How can we justify it with all our boasted eloquence once a year for a century past? I say this Republic, above all the nations of the world, ought to refuse to be a party to the purchase or the effort at purchasing sovereignty over anybody.

In 1867, when we talked of buying the Danish West Indies, Denmark refused to sell until a vote of the inhabitants could be taken, to see whether or not they would consent to be sold. Even Denmark, touched by the influence of our Constitution and our example, refused to sell the sovereignty without the consent of the people, and for this great Republic to stand up to-day before the world and claim title because they have bought from dispossessed Spain sovereignty over those people it seems to me is remarkable indeed.

I think the words of the immortal Lincoln are applicable to this situation: "A house divided against itself can not stand." Under our flag you can not have a republic and an empire. You can not have self-government and a government by force. One or the other will triumph. Either the republic will go down and the empire survive, or we will at once retrace our steps to the old safe ground and anchor our ship of state to the declaration and to the doctrine that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, any general discussion upon our final duties toward the Philippine Islands seems to me out of place and premature at this time. All our energies should be devoted to first quelling the unimportant insurrection which there prevails, and finally, and when order is restored, to turn our attention to the great problems that will face us in that archipelago. I should not have ventured to take the time of the Senate, even for a few minutes, upon this occasion had it not been for the remarkable and intemperate utterances of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

There could be no better demonstration of the value of the Senate as an open public forum than the speeches which the Senator from South Dakota has made for the past two legislative days. There are in this country some seventy million people, of all sorts—the good, the indifferent, and the bad, mostly good; but scattered through different communities, small in each, but aggregating numerically many thousands, there are citizens discontented and unhappy, who view the world with jaundiced vision; people who, perhaps, not successful themselves, possibly not deserving prosperity, rail against the success of others, view with suspicion and hatred every other person whose life and whose efforts are crowned with success. They see some wicked motive in the conduct of everybody except themselves.

When the sun shines they see only the shadows it casts, and behind every good act they find lurking some sinister and unworthy purpose. And so hate and malevolence are nourished, and the world seems to them all askew. It is but a step from individual hatred to national hatred. It is but a step from dislike of the people who succeed when they do not to dislike of the country whose administration they do not approve and to hatred of the flag and the government that nourishes and protects them. It is fitting that such people should be represented here, and I know of nobody in the whole United States so fitted to speak for them as the Senator from South Dakota, who, during all the years which I have served with him in this body—and I speak only of his public utterances—has never had a kind or friendly word to say of any person or of any cause.

And it is not alone, Mr. President, that such people should be represented, so that the opinions of everybody may be ventilated in this body, but it is also to my mind important that we should have such utterances as those of the Senator from South Dakota, that they may serve as an example and a warning and a deterrent to the thousands of young men who every year are growing to manhood and who must some day take their share in the burden of government, and upon whom eventually the mantle of responsibility must fall, that they may learn how "ill habit grows by usage," and that they may see how important it is, as they grow to manhood and responsibility, that they should cultivate a good digestion, a hopeful heart, and a cheerful mind.

Mr. President, I do not share the opinion which has been expressed in the Senate that the utterances of Senators here have any sort of effect upon the insurgents in the Philippine Islands. If Aguinaldo has his ear to the ground to hear what is going on here, he knows as well as we do how utterly trifling and unimportant are these expressions of sympathy which are from time to time heard in this Chamber. There is not a real honorable Democrat in the United States who would not admit to you that if his own party were in power the policy would be first to crush the insurrection against the flag and against the maintenance of order and our laws abroad, and then determine what should be done. These people here whose constant utterances encourage the insurrection will not fight; they will take it out in sympathy. And if our soldiers in Manila will take care of Aguinaldo and his straggling followers, as they seem to be doing very well, the American people here will take care of Aguinaldo's sympathizers in the Senate and outside of it.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota said the other day, in the commencement of his speech, that if he were a Filipino he would fight until he was gray against the unholy aggression of the armies of the United States. I have no doubt the Senator would fight if he were a Tagal; and it is possible, and I suggest to the Senator, that they might take him by adoption. I can picture him now, clad chiefly in that genial and pleasant smile which he always wears here, blazing away with his blunderbuss against everything in sight. [Laughter.]

The suggestion was the Senator's own, and it touches the imagination. It leads one to think of what would be the consequence if the Senator changed places with a Tagal. The exchange might, for purposes of experiment, at least, not be without attractiveness [laughter], and I believe if he changed places with Aguinaldo, who is brave, loyal, and patriotic, and Aguinaldo stood in the Senate representing the great State of South Dakota, which sent its soldiers to the Philippines and left some of them dead in the trenches there, he would never, Tagal though he is, be found in this body traducing the President of the United States and the Commander in Chief of our armies and slandering and maligning our officers now at the front and charging them with being "swindlers and defrauders."

Mr. President, the resolution which we are assuming to discuss is of no importance, and everybody knows that. It is covered and engulphed by a resolution which calls for all the information the Department will furnish. It is really of no value whatever, but it serves to indicate to the Senate and to the country some suspicion that there has been somewhere some crooked or dishonorable conduct in the Departments or by the Executive or this nation. Mr. President, there is nothing hidden, there is nothing that is not as open as the day, and there has been no step taken from first to last in these negotiations that does not reflect honor and credit upon the people of the United States and upon its Chief Executive. Do you remember the few words in the President's message touching our duty toward the Philippines? We can not hear them too often, and I wish to read them. They are in the last message of the President, which came to us a few days ago.

No effort will be spared to build up the waste places desolated by war and by long years of misgovernment. We shall not wait for the end of strife to begin the beneficent work. We shall continue, as we have begun, to open the schools and the churches, to set the courts in operation, to foster industry and trade and agriculture, and in every way in our power to make those people whom Providence has brought within our jurisdiction feel that it is their liberty and not our power, their welfare and not our gain, we are seeking to enhance. Our flag has never waved over any community but in blessing. I believe the Filipinos will soon recognize the fact that it has not lost its gift of benediction in its world-wide journey to their shores.

That is the last public utterance of our honored President. And this is the President whose messages and whose treatment has been described by the Senator from South Dakota as being "brutal" and "cruel." That contest can not be cruel which seeks only to lift up and make better the man who treats you as his enemy. That contest can not be fraught with hardship or oppression that looks only to the civilization and the regeneration and the benefiting of these islanders of the sea. Mr. President, there might be a great deal worse in store for the savages of the world, as yet unreclaimed, than asking them to come with us and to take pot-luck with the people of the United States, in the protection of American laws, and to sit under the shadow of the American Government; and that is what we are seeking to do in those islands to-day. When that result is attained, as it will be, then we may talk of our eventual duty to those people.

But, Mr. President, if these utterances of the Senator from South Dakota are deplorable, I still am unable to acquiesce in all of the views which have recently been stated on the floor by extremists in the other direction. We took those islands not as a rich conquest. We took them as one of the penalties and burdens of a war which was imposed upon us because of the high duty we owed the human race. We entered into this war because we could no longer listen unmoved to the cry of sufferings in Cuba, and we girded up our loins for the contest and washed ourselves clean of selfish purpose by the preliminary statement that this was not a war of aggression, and that we took the island of Cuba when we took it solely that we might help fit it for self-government and turn it over to the people who occupy it.

When the war was inaugurated none of us dreamed of our acquisition of the Philippine Islands; but when the war was closed so quickly and so victoriously and we then had to deal with our conquered foe, we found the Philippines with more than 5,000,000 people suffering under oppressions and hardships and cruelty. We found Spain humbled and bankrupt, a fallen foe, and these islands a floating derelict in the Pacific; and we took them because if we had not taken them they would have led to international complications and might have passed into unworthy hands, and principally because of the duty we owed to the people in them. And had they been as bleak and barren as the desert of Sahara, our duty to the people who occupy those islands would not have been less or different.

Mr. President, we may have to keep them indefinitely; perhaps we shall; but they are not to be kept for the reasons so far stated. I listened with the greatest interest to the remarks of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], for he was fresh from the islands and from an inspection of them. I keep an open mind upon the subject, but I confess I can not yet yield my approval of the resolution he introduced because of the arguments he adduced. He told us that there had been given him nuggets of gold and gold dust from placer diggings; that they told him of a mountain of 40 miles of coal; of unlimited beds of rich copper; he told us of great fields of Indian corn, rice, sugar, coffee, and hemp, and of the rich and tempting valley of Luzon.

He told us that the islands were peopled by savages who could not be reclaimed, and that we had made the mistake of treating them with humanity and not with severity; that they would never work, and that we must get over our lingering prejudice to Chinese labor, and that in order to reap the benefit of those islands we must fill them with foreigners; but that the islands were rich, and that therefore we should hold them.

Mr. President, to my mind that argument is base and sordid. This war, as we inaugurated it and as we carried it on, if we are true to ourselves and consider first our duty to the people, will go down in history as one of the noblest that was ever fought; but if we base our intention and purpose to retain the Philippine Islands, irrespective of the people upon them, upon the fact that they are a rich and fertile and valuable acquisition, this war will go down in history as a war of conquest, waged by a strong against a weak nation, and as a mercenary and dishonorable war, worthy of the middle ages. If we are to keep these islands, it is because we owe a duty growing out of the cause of the war, and not because we were able to take them; and the same argument that would apply to our keeping the Philippines would apply with equal force to our loading our cruisers and our battle ships with shrapnel and with shell and cruising around the world seeking for savage islands which we might conquer.

Mr. President, is there not some danger that we are facing the question before us with a sentimentality that is somewhat maudlin? I confess that I am shrinking somewhat at frequent and constant reference to Almighty God and his dealings personal with the nations of the earth. History has taught me that He usually favors the heaviest battalions, and if He governs men irrespective of human agencies there are injustices in history concerning which we will never be set right until the light of another world dawns upon us.

May it not be possible, Mr. President, that the divine plan goes no further than to hold each individual responsible for his actions toward his fellow man? It may be that we are His chosen people, and that God Almighty, as has been stated, has trusted this whole question of civilization and regeneration and conferred the duty of enlightening heathendom exclusively upon the English-speaking and Teutonic races, and chiefly upon the people of the United States. I read an extract from the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. He says:

The Philippines are ours forever, "territory belonging to the United States," as the Constitution calls them. And just beyond the Philippines are China's illimitable markets. We will not retreat from either. We will not repudiate our duty in the archipelago. We will not abandon our opportunity in the Orient. We will not renounce our part in the mission of our race, trustee, under God, of the civilization of the world. And we will move forward to our work, not howling out regrets like slaves whipped to their burdens, but with gratitude for a task worthy of our strength, and thanksgiving to Almighty God that He has marked us as His chosen people, henceforth to lead in the regeneration of the world.

He says:

God has not been preparing the English-speaking and Teutonic peoples for a thousand years for nothing but vain and idle self-contemplation and self-admiration. No! * * * He has made us adepts in government that we may administer government among savage and senile peoples. * * * And of all our race He has marked the American people as His chosen nation to finally lead in the regeneration of the world. This is the divine mission of America, and it holds for us all the profit, all the glory, all the happiness possible to man. We are trustees of the world's progress, guardians of its righteous peace. The judgment of the Master is upon us.

It may be so, Mr. President, but if it is true we should treble our fleet at once, and with England and Germany seize China and divide it, take away the French possessions in Madagascar and in Africa, and relieve Russia of its occupancy of Port Arthur and proceed to civilize and regenerate the natives.

Mr. President, my understanding of the duty and the mission of the American people was something far different. I had conceived us to be the last hope of the republics, blessed with a magnificent and large and fertile and varied area, which we were gradually filling up as our own population increased, and where we were welcoming the advent of strangers and foreigners and the oppressed from other lands, and were seeking to assimilate them with us as citizens of a free republic; and I was of impression that our land was not yet full, not yet overflowing, and that we had before us in days, we hoped of peace, vast and interesting and noble social problems that within our own borders we were to work out. That we had said to the nations of the earth, "You who are monarchies may hold your thrones so long as the people will tolerate you, but this continent is forever devoted to liberty, and you shall not put your foot upon it, nor shall we interfere with territories which you claim." That, as I understand, is our mission, our purpose, and our destiny. But events concerning which we had but little share have placed us in possession of these great islands, and we must meet those duties as we meet every duty at home, fairly and good-naturedly and hopefully and man fashion.

Mr. President, I believe myself it is idle for us to talk of being a God-given nation, with an ability to regenerate and colonize and civilize not possessed by any other people in the world. I was somewhat startled by the utterances of the Senator from Indiana when he told us that charity did not begin at home, but commenced outside and filtered back, and that, confessing the great municipal corruption which exists in all our large towns and cities almost without exception throughout these United States, a corruption which is growing less each year and will as men grow better and take greater interest in civil government, we had only to intrust the appointment of governors of the Philippines to the precinct committeemen of Indiana and of other States, when by the purity of government which would be administered in the Philippines a reflected glory and purity would shine across to our land, which would make at once our civic administration pure and stainless. Mr. President, if that be true, the Philippines would be worth to us a great many hundred millions of dollars if their soil consisted of lava beds and craters of dead volcanoes; but it is not so.

We will meet this question, and we will stumble and fall and make mistakes and pick ourselves up and go on again. When we took these islands we thought we had taken from Spain an orphan asylum which we were to nourish and nurture and make happy. It looks as if we might possibly have taken over, instead, a home for incorrigibles. But if we have, we will still deal with them in the same American fashion. It comes at the end of the century, when the world is growing better and more beneficent and kinder, when men recognize as never before their duties toward their fellow-men, when the rich are getting richer and the poor are getting richer too; and if we do our duty by these islands, as we shall, the time will some day come when the sun of prosperity, which now shines and illumines and blesses our own country, will shed its refulgent rays as well upon those islanders in far-off southern seas.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado says that I never speak a kind word of my fellow-Senators. I am not going to dispute that assertion except to say that my relations are most pleasant with almost all my fellow-Senators, and I hope he will not undertake to hide the whole Senate behind his large personality. I have not spent much time in laudation of him, because I never saw anything in his public career or private life worthy of praise; but I will confess one thing, and that now, which ought to be to his praise and to his advantage—he has a loud voice. It seems to me that his attack upon me is not worthy of reply, and I shall not reply to it.

As far as his argument is concerned, he has divided his attention between me and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. I should like to know, I should like to hear, I should like to ascertain some settled policy upon this question. We are told by the Senator from Indiana that it is greed, conquest, for the purpose of getting rich, with the idea of despoiling somebody, and we are told by the Senator from Colorado that we are prompted by ideas of philanthropy, but not quite so much philanthropy as the Senator from Indiana wishes to exercise.

Now, Mr. President, this cant about doing somebody good was the very argument which justified Spain in her conquests of the western world. No people ever went forth for conquest and for plunder who paraded more their pretext that they wished to civilize and Christianize the world. They drew their trail of blood across Mexico. What men in all the world had more religious zeal than Cortez and his followers and his priests? Pizarro destroyed the grand civilization of Peru, butchering her people right and left in the name of God. They said they did it because they wanted to confer blessings upon the people of these countries, and they made them desolate for centuries afterwards.

Russia in her conquest raises the same banner, and her newspapers are full of the same argument, the same cant.

You can pick out Spanish authors whose books are in our library, hundreds of them, who parade this excuse for conquest better than even the Senator from Colorado. And so it is with England. Wherever she has gone, wherever she has carried her conquest, as I read a short time ago, the same excuse has been made: "We are going to carry the blessings of English civilization." If you should ask the people where she has been—if you ask Ireland, and India, and the natives of New Zealand—what their opinion is of the blessing and benefit she has conferred, it seems to me it would deter us from undertaking the task.

I should like to know what the argument is? You can not smother debate or drive me from a discussion of the question by ridicule or abuse. Call me a traitor if you will. Men have been called traitors before because they stood up for what they believed to be right. Lincoln, in the House of Representatives, denounced the Mexican war and voted against its approval, and so did Alexander Stephens, of the South, and so did Boutwell, of Massachusetts, and so did many other names that might be added to the list.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Boutwell was not in the House at that time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Massachusetts says that Mr. Boutwell was not there then, and I presume I am wrong in regard to that, although I heard him in a speech say that he took that position, which perhaps was not in the House of Representatives, and he believed that more than anything else had made him twice the governor of Massachusetts. What is more, Mr. President, Daniel Webster denounced the Mexican war and afterwards was charged with being a traitor to his country by these same people who have a philanthropic mission.

Fox and Pitt in the English Parliament denounced the war against the American colonies. Is it Lord North and his miserable cabinet who live in the minds of the people of the world to-day? No; it is those champions of freedom who dared to stand up in the British Parliament and denounce the course of their government of that day. Pitt said:

What has the Government done? They have sent an armed force, consisting of 17,000 men, to drag the Bostonians into what is called duty; and we are told in the language of menace that if 17,000 won't do, 50,000 shall. If I were an American as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country I would never lay down my arms—never, never, never.

I should like to know what course this debate is to take. If those who are in favor of imperialism are afraid to embrace the doctrine of greed and of conquest for profit and disagree about the amount of philanthropy that is necessary in order to justify their position, it is hard to tell what we shall answer or combat.

In this connection, Mr. President—for I do not care to talk longer—I wish to put in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Let us be honest," from the Washington Post, of this city. It seems to me it is quite pertinent in this connection as showing how badly divided are the hosts of imperialism.

LET US BE HONEST!

Why can not we be honest in our utterances touching the territories we have recently acquired? Really it would save time and trouble, to say nothing of life and treasure, to come out frankly with the announcement that we have annexed these possessions in cold blood, and that we intend to utilize them to our profit and advantage. All this talk about benevolent assimilation; all this hypocritical pretense of anxiety for the moral, social, and intellectual exaltation of the natives: all this transparent parade of responsibility and deep seated purpose; all this deceives nobody, avails nothing, helps us not an inch in the direction of profit, dignity, and honor.

We all know down in our hearts that these islands, groups, etc., are important to us only in the ratio of their practical possibilities. We value them by the standard of their commercial usefulness, and by no other. All this gabble about civilizing and uplifting the benighted barbarians of Cuba and Luzon is mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Foolishly or wisely, we want these newly acquired territories, not for any missionary or altruistic purposes, but for the trade, the commerce, the power, and the money there are in them. Why beat about the bush and promise and protest all sorts of things? Why not be honest? It will pay.

As a matter of fact, we are not concerned in the ethical or religious uplifting of the Filipinos. After all, the difference between a breechclout and a starched shirt front is a mere matter of climate and personal opinion. Dishonesty, untruth, crime, and general wickedness are here in our midst—present with us as part of our daily life and growing with our growth. We need not go to the West Indies or the Philippines in search of material for moral rescue. Our own slums abound with opportunities for missionary zeal.

Why not tell the truth and say—what is the fact—that we want Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Luzon, together with any other islands in either ocean that may hereafter commend themselves to our appetite, because we believe they will add to our national strength, and because we hope they will some day become purchasers at our bargain counters? We might as well throw off the pious mask and indulge ourselves in a little honest candor. It will cost us nothing, and it may profit much. At any rate, we shall have the comfort and satisfaction of being honest with ourselves and the privilege of looking into the mirror without blushing.—Washington Post, Sunday, January 14, 1900.

I present that as an answer to the whole philanthropic portion of the speeches of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Colorado.

But in order to bring this debate back, it seems to me, to a higher plane and better character, I will read briefly, some verses by Howard S. Taylor, of Chicago:

THE CREED OF THE FLAG.

Who will haul down the flag?—President McKinley.

"Who will haul down the flag?" quoth he.

Why, no hand of flesh and bone

Can lower that flag, on land or sea,

Till the faith of the flag is gone!

Till a few shall rule and cunningly keep

The bunting to garnish their greed:

Till dollars are dear and humanity cheap

By the force of a tory creed!

Then will it fall!—but answer us, clear,

Do you fancy that hour is drawing near?

Did our Liberty Bell ring in vain?

Was our Declaration a lie?

Must we turn to the Old World again,

With the penitent prodigal's cry?

Must we arm us and march in the van

Of Europe's barbaric parade,

And boom out a gunpowder gospel to man

To open a pathway for trade?

Shall we strut through the world and bluster and brag

With the dollar mark stamped on the brave old flag?

Nay, haul up the flag—raise it high—

Not yet is its spirit spent!

Let it sing to the wind and the sky

The truth that it always meant!

Let it sing of the birthright of man,

Of progress that never can lag,

Let it sing that trade may go—where it can,

But liberty follows the flag!

Yea, haul up Old Glory—but, comrades, take heed

That no man part the old flag from the creed!

HOWARD S. TAYLOR.

CHICAGO, January 7, 1899.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise simply to make an inquiry. I understand that all these resolutions will come up to-morrow for final disposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not informed that any agreement has been made that the resolutions shall.

Mr. LODGE. Then I ask that the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota which has been under discussion and that of my colleague and my own may go over until to-morrow without losing their place, and I trust that to-morrow we shall dispose of them finally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL CAPABILITIES OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a third report on the investigations of the agricultural capabilities of Alaska for the year 1899, in accordance with the acts of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1899, and June 30, 1900.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 15, 1900.

[NOTE.—Report, etc., accompanies message sent to the House of Representatives.]

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, certain information relative to the $50,000,000 appropriated by Congress under the act approved March 9, 1898, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes," and stating that no portion of this amount was assigned to or expended by or under the direction of the Post-Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Acting Commissary-General of Subsistence, together with a copy of the contract to furnish flour with the C. A. Gambrill Manufacturing Company, of Baltimore, Md., in May, 1898, and copies of correspondence relative thereto.

This information has been transmitted in reply to a resolution offered in the last Congress by the then senior Senator from Maryland, Mr. Gorman. In the opinion of the Chair it will be better that it shall be referred to the Committee on Printing. It will be so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a communication in response to a resolution in relation to quartermasters' contracts, which the senior Senator from Maryland at the last Congress submitted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought it not to be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair doubts whether it should be printed, and therefore has sent it to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if I may, without being subjected to the covert charge of treason, I will submit some remarks upon House bill No. 1.

The question which I am to discuss is grave, and yet it is not the gravest question confronting the American people.

The integrity of our free institutions is insidiously assailed. The right to disseminate truth to combat error and overthrow falsehood is questioned. There are those who would place under the ban this right, sacred to freemen and formidable to tyrants only. Freedom of speech in a republic is as sacred as the Ark of the Covenant in the holy temple of religion.

Any who would lay sacrilegious hands upon this are enemies of human freedom and must be overthrown.

I believe in the old Republic. I have no sympathy with imperialism or with any of its mercenary and blood-stained projects.

Mr. President, the House bill "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all kinds of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes," which on Monday, the 18th of December last—when, in the midst of panic in New York, money was so scarce as to command 186 per cent on call—passed that branch of Congress by the unanimous vote of its Republican members, was the next day by the Senate referred to its Committee on Finance, and, strange to say, immediately reported back by the Republican majority of that committee with the recommendation that all the bill after the enacting clause be stricken out and a measure differing in tenor and effect substituted.

Thus, suddenly, was a long-cherished financial scheme conceived among the cave dwellers of Manhattan—sanctioned, undoubtedly, by their English archetypes upon the Thames, crystallized in select Republican caucus, in the dog days, at Atlantic City, sanctified by the approval of the Administration, and passed, as aforesaid, by the House—brought to grief in the very inner circle of its friends, the reorganized Republican Committee on Finance.

If this Senate attack could be regarded as sincere, bad as it is, it would afford cause for congratulation. But as the attendant circumstances must lead to the conclusion that it is but a parliamentary maneuver, temporarily to disarm criticism and smooth the way of the measure into conference from which will be sprung something even more menacing to the welfare of the country than the House bill, the present procedure must be treated as a part of the juggling hypocrisy and false pretense with which the Republican party has been wont to deal with the money question.

If we cared we might, upon this question, measure the Republican party by its own standard, try it by the declarations and conduct of its own leaders, and convict it and them out of their own mouths of insincerity in their dealing with the American people.

Their pledge in 1896 to "promote" international bimetallism; the appropriation of $100,000 March 3, 1897, to send a commission to Europe to bring it about; the President's message to the House in June of that year, while the commissioners were abroad, commending the "Indianapolis" scheme, based upon the permanent establishment of the single gold standard; the passage of a bill by unanimous vote of the Republicans of the House, pursuant to the President's message, on the day it was received, appropriating $100,000 to promote the permanent establishment in the United States of the single standard of gold—the first $100,000 to promote bimetallicism, the second to defeat it; the first to defray the expense of the commission appointed by the President to operate in Europe for bimetallicism, the second to defray the expense of another commission appointed by the same President and to work at the same time for the permanent establishment of the single gold standard—such is but part of their record of duplicity.

Was ever inconsistency more glaring? Was there ever treachery more perfidious?

The Republican party can not be trusted to deal honestly and frankly with this question.

The "and for other purposes" appended to the title of the bill might well have been defined. If so, and the truth had been spoken, it would have revealed a nefarious compact and a promise of its fulfillment. The contributions of the banks in 1896 to the Republicans are reported to have been enormous. That alone accounts for the present occupancy of the White House. That explains how the six and a half millions of honest, independent, patriotic, and intelligent white men who voted for Mr. Bryan were defeated at the polls, how the idle, the vicious, the dependent, the ignorant, the alien, and the degenerate, everything corruptible, were thrown into the scale with the respectable but hopeless members of the Republican party to defeat the Democratic ticket.

These organizations who thus did so much for the Republican party have long been clamorous for their promised reward. They will have it. They will exact the fullest measure. They will not be put aside or cheated. Those Republicans who have halted, hesitated, and parleyed are being coerced and driven into line. The Republican leaders must show a record of promises kept to be able to make the fresh demands which will be so urgent during the coming campaign. Hence the House bill. Hence the unseemly haste in rushing it through.

Before making an analysis of the House bill (for it is to that I shall devote attention) and pointing out its probable injurious effects, I desire to recur as briefly as I am able to some elementary principles, self-evident in their correctness and whose intrinsic soundness can not well be questioned.

To man out of society, in a state of permanent isolation, money would be as useless as it would be indispensable to the social organization of which he might become a part. The Digger Indian is not an object lesson of the effect of the gold standard in the United States. Neither is the semibarbarian, dwelling half clad in his hovel, who does not borrow or lend, buy or sell, except in a limited degree, an object lesson of the effect of the silver standard in Mexico. You might pour into the lap of one of these the wealth of a Croesus—for a few days he would live the life of a glutton, and then perish from the earth. If one of these beings should happen to cross the imaginary line which divides the sovereignty of these nations, if he should happen to change the metal in his pocket, if he had a pocket, it would not transfuse the blood which flows in his veins.

The small community might get along, making some division of their labor by a system of barter. But every transaction of barter must depend upon and await the coming together of persons having reciprocal needs and the power or means of mutual accommodation.

To use a familiar illustration, the man with two hats and no boots would profit if only he could find a man with extra boots and no hat. It might be that the one would become footsore before he would be able to find the other. Thus, while one member of the community might produce more of a given article than he could consume, he, in many instances, would find it difficult to procure someone to take it off his hands in exchange for something which the latter had to spare and the former needed.

The search for trades would often be fruitless. The time and energy which would be lost—wasted—under such a system would at least retard all progress and keep the community in a state of stagnation and poverty.

The necessity for something to serve as a measure of value and a general medium of exchange would become manifest.

Money is the outgrowth of the necessities of man in a state of society. For this reason every community in every stage almost of human development and at every period in the world's history has selected and used something which may be called money.

It is not very important to inquire as to the various articles, things, or materials which at different times and states of society have been selected for this purpose. The nature of the thing has always depended upon the particular needs and situation of the people adopting it.

Whether skins, sheep, cattle, corn, shells, the different metals, from iron to gold, were adopted, the use, the function performed has ever been largely the same.

Whenever a community has, by custom or law, adopted anything for this use, it has been to the end that to those who acquired or possessed it it would represent and command all desirable objects for sale and all needed services for hire, and indicate precisely the quantity of such things to be obtained by means of it.

Whoever produced in excess of his own needs would part with his surplus for money, because by means of the money so obtained he would acquire the ability and right to purchase any of the whole variety of surplus products of all the other members of the community then in existence or which might come into existence during his lifetime.

To its possessor it would be a measure of value, ever indicating that quantity of useful things, the amount of needed services to be obtained at his will in exchange for it. Instead of parting with his own labor or the products of his labor for the labor or products of others, he sold his own for money and then used the money to obtain theirs.

MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE.

The exchange of labor or commodity has as certainly taken place in the one case as in the other. But in the one case money has been the means of effecting it. Money has been for him thus a medium of exchange. Exchanges are not only accomplished by means of money, but greatly facilitated by its use. By it time is economized and the energies of the people conserved.

Money thus gives employment to labor and supplies a market for its surplus products. It is the alert and efficient middleman which brings buyer and seller together to their mutual enrichment.

It is, moreover, the standard by which each man measures his own and the wealth of his neighbors and that of the entire community.

With reference to this standard the burdens of public expenditure are equitably apportioned and distributed.

It serves also as a measure of deferred payments. It is at once a measure and the means of enforcing the performance of contracts. It also measures the liability of their nonfulfillment.

Money is thus a standard or measure of value, a medium of exchange, a measure of deferred payments, and means of performing contracts.

Its possessor may immediately convert it to supply his present wants or desires. He may keep it to provide for future wants or desires. If he stores it away or hoards it, while it becomes to him a store of value, it ceases to be an active agent either in facilitating or effecting exchanges. It is not dead, but latent. It is true that the use of money as a store of value is not necessarily inconsistent with its active use as a medium of exchange.

It may perform both functions at the same time. It may be loaned to be put into circulation by the borrower, its owner, whose wealth is stored in it, retaining the right to demand its return at the needed moment.

QUALITIES OF MONEY.

The thing or material in which money is symbolized ought to be something which is convenient to handle as it passes from hand to hand in effecting exchanges.

It ought to be durable, so that as a standard measure and store of value it may not suffer diminution or destruction.

It ought not to be easily counterfeited, and should be readily distinguishable from all things to which the money function or privilege does not pertain.

The quantity or number of units or pieces ought to be such that the community should at all times have a sufficient supply to enable its members to effect their exchanges with the greatest conservation of energy and economy in time.

It should be so adjusted as to measure values and deferred payments, and be the means of performing contracts equitably and justly. No man or class of men should be able to profit or compelled to suffer loss by its contraction or expansion.

In practice it may not be possible to attain to such a just and ideal system of money. It is such a system, however, which should ever be kept in view and to which the nearest possible approach should be made.

By far the most important consideration relating to this subject is:

What shall the quantity of money be and to what extent shall the original supply be from time to time increased, and by what method shall such quantity and its increase be fixed and furnished?

Shall it be by the automatic system, the fiat system, or a combination of both?

There is but one distinction between these two systems. In the fiat system there are three elements, each the creature of legislation.

Legislation designates the material in which the unit of money shall be symbolized and the device by which it may be identified. Legislation gives to it its legal-tender quality. Legislation fixes the number of units which may be issued. Every element of this money is dependent upon the behest of government.

VOLUME OF MONEY.

In the automatic system the unit or the material of which it is composed and the device by which it may be distinguished are the creatures of legislation; the legal-tender quality is bestowed by law, but the number of units or volume of money is left to depend upon the quantity of material or metal which may be discovered and produced.

In the one case the quantity of money is regulated or limited by artificial law; in the other by natural law.

Under the first system almost any convenient durable substance which may by suitable superscription or device be identified and protected from counterfeit may be selected for use as money. Because the number of money units will be arbitrarily fixed and limited. The volume of money will depend upon the will or caprice of the lawmaker.

By the fiat of legislation it will be great or small, with all the results following upon the plethora or dearth of money supply.

Under the automatic system the material selected must be of limited production, because if like the sands upon the seashore, it could readily be produced in unlimited quantity, the number of money units would soon approach infinity and their value or purchasing power zero.

GOLD AND SILVER.

Hence gold and silver, by the common consent of the human race, have ever been regarded as meeting most fully the requirements of the automatic system. The scarcity of these metals and the difficulties attending their production and separation from the crude materials with which they are usually found combined in nature gave assurance that their free use for money would not lead to unjust inflation.

Fiat money has usually been resorted to, not from choice, but from the necessity arising from the extreme scarcity at times of the precious metals or from some sudden and great demand for money. This has generally happened in times of war. England in 1796, during the war with Napoleon, had to resort to paper money. The United States have been compelled to do the same during each of the wars in which they were engaged except that with Mexico.

Since no civilized community can exist and progress without money, if gold and silver can not be obtained, something else will be adopted to take their place and perform their money function.

THE FIAT SYSTEM.

There is no essential evil connected with the fiat system of money except its liability to abuse. Those who control the issues and who, at will and without expense, may add to the volume of money are placed under great temptation.

The Government of France in issuing assignats, yielding to this temptation, so multiplied the issue that they became worthless, thus inflicting great wrong upon the nation. The farming out to private persons in England of the right to issue copper tokens without restriction, led to similar evils in that country. The turning over to the banks under this bill the entire control of all circulation other than gold, limited only by the discretion of a Secretary as to the issuance of bonds, he ever subservient to their wishes, will prove equally fraught with mischief.

If the number of money units in the fiat system were justly limited, so that their purchasing power would remain uniform and thereby the general level of prices be maintained, that system would be free from serious objection. Still experience has shown that fiat money has, as a rule, been resorted to as a temporary device in times of emergency or by some nation in distress and has had no recognition beyond the limits of the state or nation adopting it.

Even within the limits of such state the people may have little confidence in the permanency or durability of the system. The overthrow of the government destroys the value of such money effectually. Confederate notes utterly collapsed in value with the termination of the civil war.

So far all fiat systems have proved as fleeting and uncertain as the government which adopted them or the exigencies which brought them forth.

Such systems lacked soundness, in that the people have no confidence in their permanency, or, at least, in their continuance under uniform and reasonable regulations and limitations.

Under the automatic system, with gold and silver as the basis by which the supply of money for all time and in all nations was to be determined until the nineteenth century, at least, the question of soundness or permanency was never raised.

SCHEMES OF AVARICE.

The sordid promptings of avarice and chicanery have done much during the present century to impair confidence in the stability even of the automatic system.

The demonetization of silver by Great Britain in 1816, at a time when the annual product of that metal was about three times greater than that of gold; the like action in respect to gold by Prussia and the German states in 1857, when the annual output of gold was some four times greater than that of silver, and the change back to gold again by Germany in 1873, preceded by the covert passage through the Congress of the United States of the bill denying access to the mints to silver, and followed by the suspension of silver coinage by France and other nations, all these different nations seemingly being impelled to this action by the potent influence of a class which could alone profit by the policy of monetary contraction—all this has led to the unsettlement of values, great disturbances of commerce, and distrust as to the stability of any system of monetary supply.

Until recently there was but little disagreement among writers upon finance and money as to the influence which the supply of money has upon prices, industry, and business.

The general rule is that, other things being equal, the value of money is in proportion to its quantity.

By value of money is meant its purchasing power, or the rate at which it will exchange for other commodities or property.

Otherwise stated, as the number of units of money is increased, other things being equal, the purchasing power of each unit will diminish.

Augment the number of money units, and each unit as a standard for the measurement of the value of other commodities becomes less. Any particular commodity will thus require more money units to represent or measure its value than before; a proportionate rise in the prices of other commodities than money takes place. When the supply of money is increased, prices rise; when the supply of money is diminished, prices fall.

This law has been considered so well established as to be called axiomatic.

However, it has recently been denied.

VALUE OF MONEY.

It is contended that the value of money does not depend upon the number of its units in circulation, but upon what is called its "intrinsic" value, or the demand for the material of which the unit is composed for other uses than that of money. It is insisted that the value or purchasing power of gold or silver is precisely what those metals will bring for use as ornaments and in the industrial arts.

A moment's reflection ought to convince any reasonable mind that this is not true.

These metals, without the money privilege, and regarded simply as commodities, would have values depending upon the demand for them, the estimation in which they might be held for the various known uses to which they could be applied.

If some new and beneficial use should then be discovered which would exhaust a large portion of the supply of these metals, is it not clear that their value would correspondingly rise? Again, if this new demand should be taken away, the value of these metals would as certainly suffer a decline.

The demand for these metals for coinage and for use as money operates like any other demand upon their value as commodities.

If there is uncertainty as to the continued use of a given metal or material as money, the people among whom it circulates may have greater confidence in it from the fact that it will still possess value, although demonetized.

It should be borne in mind that a material which is in greater demand for other uses than for money is thereby unsuited for coinage or use as money.

If a given quantity of it is coined or used as money, it will not circulate as such, but will immediately be converted to its more valuable use. Say an ounce of platinum is worth more than a dollar for the uses to which now as a commodity it may be applied. Then suppose it should be provided that an ounce of that metal should be issued as money and stand for $1. It is clear that it would not circulate as money, but would be withdrawn from circulation to be converted to its more valuable use.

The intrinsic value of a material which equals or exceeds its monetary value is inconsistent with the essential service which money is designed to perform—that is, as a medium of exchange. Such a material will not perform the principal duty of money. While high intrinsic value may thus destroy its efficiency as money, it otherwise exerts no influence upon its circulation or purchasing power. The latter must always depend upon the demand for money and the quantity of it in circulation.

NO CREDIT VALUE.

It is also insisted in some quarters that if the value of money does not depend upon the intrinsic or commercial value of the material of which it is composed, then its value rests upon the credit of the government which authorizes its issue. This contention leads to absurdity. Money in the government treasury or exacted under the taxing power from the people, or at least obtained in some manner, is the only means by which the government can meet the pecuniary demands upon it. The credit of the government is good or bad according to its ability and readiness promptly to meet its obligations and pay its debts.

Credit thus does not give value to money. On the other hand, without money credit could not exist. Credit is not the basis of money, but money is the basis of credit. Credit in a government without money or the means of obtaining it is inconceivable. This idea that credit gives value to money is of very recent origin. It is put forth as one of the supports of the policy of contraction and to give it popularity. If the people can be made to believe that every dollar which is issued is a debt and burden which they must ultimately discharge, they will be the more easily convinced that the number of dollars issued should be as small as possible. The present efforts in Congress to pass a law calling in the United States Treasury notes for cancellation and for funding them in interest-bearing bonds are pursuant to this policy. The effort to fund the silver circulation in like manner is in harmony with the same vicious policy.

These two classes of money are to be treated as a public debt, payable on demand, for which deferred payments in the form of bonds are to be substituted.

Were this accomplished, a great contraction in our money supply would result, with the consequent decline in prices and the corresponding rise in the purchasing power of gold and the value of credits, including the bonds by which the notes and silver had been funded.

Instead of this relieving the Government, or the people, who in reality constitute it, from any burden, its debt would actually be greatly increased and its credit impaired because of the greater sacrifice which the Government or its people would have to make to obtain money thus made scarce.

The promoters of this bill well understand the operations of this principle. Who are they? The chairman of the Committee on Finance has answered. He says:

In considering the possibilities of the future we can not overlook the fact that the national debts of the world have increased at an astonishing rate. In 1862 the aggregate of the national debts of the world was about thirteen thousand million dollars and in 1892 thirty-one thousand millions.

The holders of these debts, this gigantic, world-wide syndicate, cold, impassive, greedy, and remorseless, have for years steadily progressed in restricting the inhabitants of the earth to the use of gold alone with which to meet this mighty aggregate of obligation.

Let the Senator from Rhode Island tell how they are benefited. He says:

We offer the holder of outstanding bonds the inducement of an obligation payable, principal and interest, specifically in gold coin and a security for a long term in place of one maturing in a short time.

And again:

In recent years there has been a gradual appreciation in the prices of high-class securities throughout the world. This movement has been more marked in the United States than elsewhere. The increasing demand for our bonds has given to these securities an exceptionally strong position in the world's market. Take the four of 1907 as an example. The prices at which they have sold in the past five months have realized to investors the following rates: August, 2.195 per cent; September, 2.223 per cent; October, 2.255 per cent; November, 2.306 per cent; December, 2.005 per cent.

A profit of more than 2 per cent a month. Their creed is more bonds and less money.

Money holders can not profitably invest in commodities or property or use their money in productive industry upon a falling market. So long as the decline in prices continues they may profit by hoarding the money or storing it away and holding it.

However, it is under precisely such conditions that money may most profitably be invested in Government securities, which, in addition to drawing interest, appreciate with gold proportionately with the decline in the values of other kinds of property.

By treating a portion of the money supply as a debt and funding it in this class of securities their own appreciation in value is greatly accelerated, and the correlative conditions of declining values and stagnant industries ensue.

DEMAND FOR MONEY.

It is true that there are other things which may affect the value or purchasing power of money besides quantity. The demand for money must always be taken into the account.

In one sense it may be truly said that the demand for money is always at a maximum. Whoever wants anything, any desirable object, first wants money, demands money.

Obtaining money, he at once transforms it into the object of his desire. So the demand for money equals the sum of the demand of all the people for all other things.

The demand for money has been considered as commensurate with the necessities, wants, and desires of the human race.

However, it must not be supposed that this demand which connection with supply fixes the value of money or the prices of commodities or property is the equivalent of necessity, want, or desire. The wants and desires of people are insatiable, illimitable. The supply of money necessarily being limited, if its value were fixed by demand in this sense it would logically follow that such value would fast approach the infinite.

Many a tramp is consumed with a desire to possess the mansion of the millionaire. Yet such desire does not add a penny to its exchangeable value.

The necessity, the want, the desire, before it can have any influence upon values or prices, must itself be capitalized, must be possessed of desirable objects, things of utility to others, and to obtain which others are willing to make a sacrifice. One person being the owner of an object of utility will not part with it except in exchange for another object of still greater utility to him.

No trade will take place when the sacrifice to be made would exceed the benefit to be derived.

The demand for money, while great, is always counterbalanced by the demand for other things; and there are some things which are even more necessary to human existence than money.

In the days of Job, skins seem to have constituted the money of the people. Still it was then said "Skin for skin; yea, all that a man hath he will give for his life." In all climates food is a necessity; in most, food, clothing, and shelter are indispensable. Before being deprived of these in the degree necessary to preserve life, almost any sacrifice of other things, including money, will be made. Every source of supply is itself accompanied with a demand which must be satisfied upon terms which will be satisfactory before the supply is surrendered.

A man presenting a horse and asking for it a hundred dollars in money creates such a demand as tends to fix the value of money, just as a man with a hundred dollars, willing to purchase a horse, presents a demand which affects the price of horses.

Thus qualified and explained, the value or purchasing power of money depends upon its quantity and the demand for it.

INFLUENCE UPON PRICES.

In considering the question of the influence of money upon prices it is necessary to keep in mind the different uses to which money is applied.

Only that portion of the money supply which for the time being is seeking exchange for commodities or other property, and so performing its function as a medium of exchange, operates in fact as a measure of value and to fix the general level of prices.

Money hoarded or used simply as a store of value, while possessing a potential influence, a latent energy, can have but little effect upon values or productive industry. While prices are on a decline such money has no inducement to leave its hiding place; because, in the hands of its holder its command of commodities and other property increases day by day as long as such decline in values continues. Such a situation is an encouragement to the withdrawal of money from active circulation.

Thus the proportion of money employed simply as a store of value is augmented.

That which seeks exchange for other property and helps to sustain the level of prices is diminished. So the speed of falling prices is accelerated as the withdrawal and hoarding of money proceeds.

Finally the necessities of the people holding the money for food, for clothing and shelter, or the cravings of pride and ambition force money from its hiding place to seek exchange for the things with which such necessity or desire may be gratified. This affords an impetus to a higher level of prices. As values of property other than money proceed in an ascending and that of money in a downward scale it becomes more profitable to store wealth in property than in money; and so the money is put into circulation, stimulating trade and vivifying industry.

It has been noticed and remarked by some of the ablest writers on finance that a decrease of money in circulation has a much greater proportionate effect in depressing the level of prices than an increase in the money supply has in raising such prices.

EFFECT OF RAISING PRICES.

With the level of prices at a certain stage, a given quantity of money may effect so many exchanges against commodities. Now raise the level of prices and it will require a greater quantity of money to effect the same exchanges. Every transaction requires more money. This increased demand for money always attends any increase of the quantity of it put into circulation, and tends to prevent a diminution of its purchasing power and to retard the upward tendency of prices.

Besides, under the stimulus of growing prices new industries might be established, new fields for enterprise and new channels of trade are opened in which money may be profitably employed.

Again, as wealth increases more people desire money in which to store their wealth, thus freeing themselves from the labor and responsibility of looking after the use and preservation of other kinds of property.

All these causes cooperate to prevent a depreciation in the value of money whose volume is increased. The added increment gives an impulse to the welfare and advancement of the race; and instead of becoming a competitor of the existing money, supply creates a new and added demand for its own use.

Time scarcely permits more than a passing notice of the fact that not only the quantity of money but also the rapidity of its circulation affects prices. The level of prices varies as the supply of money multiplied by the number of exchanges which it accomplishes. This is but a corollary to the proposition that only the money which is seeking exchanges measures value.

Credit also has been regarded as exerting an influence in this direction. A man with a credit of a thousand dollars and an equal amount of money who buys a farm for $2,000 creates a demand with his credit as well as with his money which tends to enhance the price of farms.

It is said that the perfection of the credit system dispenses with the necessity of money. It is true that in times of buoyancy and confidence prices may be raised and business conducted simply by an extension or exchange of credit. However, it is a foundation of sand. Such prices are fluctuating and unstable. Such business has insolvency ever staring it in the face.

Credit is a good substitute for money until confidence is impaired and liquidation is demanded. It is then found to be worthless. The essential quality of being a lawful tender in payment of debts is lacking.

EXAMPLE FROM HISTORY.

Some examples, taken from history, may be given of the effect of an increasing or diminishing supply of money upon prices, trade, and business.

In King Solomon's time the navy of Tarshish brought gold and silver from the Tartessus and the navy of Hiram brought gold from Ophir, and "the King made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones." (I Kings x, 27.)

And the King made silver and gold in Jerusalem as plenteous as stones. (II Chronicles, i, 15.)

Such a superabundance of money ought, according to some modern financiers, to have brought the people of Israel to the very depths of financial abasement and misery.

Not so. It is said that these people attained their acme of prosperity in the days of King Solomon.

So King Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom. (I Kings, x, 23.)

Jerusalem was most glorious. Trade and commerce flourished. All other nations were proud to do her homage and pay her tribute.

The seat of wealth, the center of power, her people were pre-eminent for their advancement in all the arts of peace and war, for their civilization, prosperity, and wisdom.

The greatest glory of Egypt seems to have been coincident with, if not caused by, the great output of gold from the plains of Nubia.

It is remarkable how the commercial prestige and glory of the nations of antiquity seem to have synchronized with the possession of the great gold and silver mines of Spain.

There seems to be little doubt that King Solomon's navy of Tarshish, which returned after periodical voyages of three years each, bearing gold and silver, visited the river in Spain anciently known as Tartessus, but now known as the Guadalquivir.

These mines next came into the possession of the Phoenicians. Carthage next succeeded to and held them for two centuries, until 200 B. C., during which time she was mistress of the seas and presided over the destinies of commerce.

Rome followed and held them while she retained the mastery of the world.

The mining of gold and silver at ancient Attica was at flood tide in the age of Pericles. The smelting works were at Ergasteria, 40 miles from Athens.

The scoria from these ancient works has recently (since 1870) yielded more than $5,000,000 to a company of French and Italians working it over under a lease from the Grecian Government.

Jacob, in his History of the Precious Metals, estimates that the amount of gold and silver in Rome in the Augustan period was $1,900,000,000; that after that time it dwindled until eight hundred years later it amounted to but one-eleventh of that quantity.

A MIGHTY AGENT.

The distinguished historian, Sir Alexander Alison, very justly observes: "That two leading events which have occurred in the history of mankind have been directly brought about by a successive contraction and expansion of the circulating medium of society."

The fall of the Roman Empire, so long ascribed, in ignorance, to slavery, heathenism, and social corruption, was in reality brought about by a decline in the silver and gold mines of Spain and Greece. And so, as if Providence had intended to reveal in the clearest manner the influence of this mighty agent in human affairs, the resurrection of mankind from the ruin which these causes had produced was owing to the directly opposite set of agencies being put in operation.

Columbus led the way in the career of renovation; when he spread his sails across the Atlantic he bore mankind and its fortunes in his bark.

The annual supply of the precious metals for the use of the globe had tripled before a century had expired; the price of every species of produce was quadrupled. The weight of debt and taxes insensibly wore off under the influence of that prodigious increase; in the renovation of industry the relations of society were changed, the weight of feudalism cast off, the rights of man established. Among the many concurring causes which conspired to bring about this mighty consummation, the most important, though hitherto least observed, was the discovery of Mexico and Peru.

From the discovery of America until 1640 it has been estimated by the most competent statisticians (Pixley and Hay) that the precious metals had increased until their quantity was six times greater than at the beginning of that period; that during the same time the level of prices advanced but 200 per cent, thus confirming the principle hereinbefore alluded to. After 1640, while the supply of the precious metals was greatly increased, prices remained uniform, thus showing that the increase of population, business, and wealth was sufficient to absorb the entire supply of money.

At the beginning of this century the Spanish-American revolutions led to the neglect of the mines in Mexico and Peru. The result, coupled with the demonetization of silver by England in 1816, is of great significance.

EFFECT OF CONTRACTION.

In 1822, Mr. Atwood in a speech in Parliament declared that there had been an average fall in the prices of the great articles of commerce of 45 per cent; that the fall was universal, embracing every article of industry, every branch of commerce.

In the work of Sismondi, published in 1827, it was declared that "a cry of distress is raised from all the manufacturing towns of the Old World and all the fields of the New World reecho it."

In 1830 Earl Stanhope said that the depression had been continuous and universal since 1816; that in ten years general prices had fallen 68 per cent.

In 1824 Mr. Clay vividly portrayed the distress in this country, saying that the values had fallen more than 50 per cent.

In 1843 Miss Martineau said "the depression had so deepened that many must die and a multitude lowered to a state of sickness and irritability from want of food."

The culmination of distress was reached in 1849. In that one year the persons in receipt of public charity in the British Isles were 4,250,000 in number. Every seventh person was a pauper and a public charge.

Prices had by this time, according to C. F. Bastable, professor of political economy in Trinity College, fallen two and one-half times.

But a new epoch was at hand. The gold discoveries in California and Australia constituted the bow of promise, which had its fulfillment in advancing prices and renewed activity in every line of industry, trade, and commerce.

Chevalier predicted that on account of the enormous output of gold prices would advance 50 per cent, to the ruin of creditors, and advised the demonetization of that metal.

Wolowski predicted that the rise would not exceed 10 per cent, as the added increments of money supply would create new fields for its operation and be largely absorbed by the increasing population and the expansion of trade and industry.

Wolowski was right.

The course of general prices of growing or languishing trade and industry since prior to 1849 has been carefully observed and noted under the system of index numbers in all the leading commercial nations, all of which tends strongly to confirm the truth of this statement of Alexander Hamilton, that:

To annul the use of either of these metals is to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium and is liable to all the objections which arise from the comparison of the benefits of a fall with the evils of a scanty circulation.

During the years 1898 and 1899 there was a temporary advance in prices and increased activity in business directly traceable to a wholly adventitious increase of the circulation. A part of this increase came from coinage of silver bullion in the Treasury. But the greater portion was due to the draft of gold from abroad by enlarged exports of food products at higher prices by reason of crop failures in Europe and Asia, the gold discoveries in the Klondike, and the increased output of gold in the United States and South Africa.

The last three are the main sources of gold production, while the first was the means of unequal distribution to the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury reports that there was in circulation in the United States in 1897 $1,640,209,519, in 1898 $1,837,859,895, and in 1899 $1,904,071,881. The increase from 1897 to 1898 was about $200,000,000, and from 1898 to 1899 the increase was about $66,000,000, in round numbers. With the latter had to be met the demands of an increasing population and the great drain and loss to Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines.

The money sent to these islands has more than exhausted the increment of increase for the past year.

The gold supply from South Africa is and will be for an indefinite period absolutely cut off. It is authentically stated that the gold output in the Klondike has reached its maximum and is now on the decline. There will inevitably result a great falling off in general production. As to distribution, the tide of gold, instead of being toward our shores, is setting strongly in the other direction at the rate of several million dollars each day.

Stringency of money and panic and financial wreckage come in natural, inevitable, and fatal sequence. Here the demand for money is augmented for use and loss outside our borders in far distant islands and among hordes of alien and barbarous peoples from whose bourne it will never return. The financial fabric of the commercial world is tottering. For gold alone is an insufficient and inadequate base to sustain it. The financial bed can not be covered with the golden blanket.

For a short time we have been warmed by pulling to our side the lion's share, while others suffered the exposure. Now it is being taken from us, and we will be made to suffer the chilling blast of poverty which must result. Already prices are falling, and the wail of distress will soon again be heard throughout the land.

Hence, as has been seen, as the production of the precious metals has increased or fallen off, as the volume of money has expanded or contracted, just so has civilization and the welfare of the human race waxed or waned.

Tell me the history of the discovery and development of the mines of gold and silver when these metals have been free for use as money and I will reveal to you the secret in the annals of human progress or retrogression.

BOTH METALS NEEDED.

The imperative necessity of the use of both gold and silver for purposes of money throughout the world is generally conceded.

The use of both is essential to the welfare and happiness of mankind. The reestablishment of such use is of such transcendent importance that no ordinary difficulty should be permitted to stand in the way of its achievement.

This is generally acknowledged. Without both gold and silver the people must sink in the scale of happiness and of civilization; they must languish in poverty; they must continue to struggle in vain to better their condition; they must toil on without even the hope of adequate reward.

Yet it is said that while there is a great, an all-pervading, all-destroying wrong, there is and can be no remedy—or at best no remedy except with the aid of those who are and will remain deaf to all appeals for relief.

The maxims of our race have proven false; the times, indeed, are out of joint, if at this day—this forlorn and unhappy day, this precise point of time out of all eternity—there is a right which can not be made to prevail, a wrong for which there is no remedy.

A PLAIN REMEDY.

But in spite of all dismal predictions to the contrary, it is not so. There is a remedy, plain, natural, and effectual.

That remedy is the enactment of a law by the Congress of these United States of America providing for the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver—such coin to be a lawful tender in payment of debts at the existing ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid of any other nation.

What would happen upon the passage of such a law?

It is predicted that many evils would come to afflict the people. It is said that gold would be driven from circulation; that we would at once pass to a silver basis; that thus a great and sudden contraction of the volume of money would take place, and that money, even silver, would be scarcer, would be more difficult to obtain than now.

At the same time it is said that by some illogical and devilish device, while dollars would be much scarcer and more difficult to obtain than now, when obtained their purchasing power would be actually much less than at present; the dollars at the same instant would cheat both him who parted with them and him who received them.

It is further said that such money would be an instrument of fraud and dishonesty; that though cold and spiritless and endowed with no moral attribute, it would be dishonest money. That such dollars would not be equal to the sum of all their parts, that they would not be double their halves or four times their quarters, that 100 cents would be, in reality, but 50.

It is claimed that the aggregate of indebtedness of all kinds in this country is as much as $60,000,000,000, and that the persons owing these debts would at once pay them off in the 50-cent silver dollars, thus despoiling and robbing the creditors of some $30,000,000,000. To the debtor it is also pointed that his creditor will no longer have compassion; that the claims of the latter will be suddenly and inexorably enforced, as in a panic, and that the former will be turned out without property and without hope.

Such are some of the diverse and direful evils which it is predicted will follow in the train of the free coinage of silver.

It is furthermore contended that this Government, alone and without the aid of other governments, can not maintain the parity between the metals with the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Now it may be true that this Government as an artificial entity—separate and apart from the people and their commerce—could not maintain the parity. I do not believe that this Government cooperating with all other governments, acting merely as artificial entities and distinct from the people who carry on the commerce of the world, could maintain the parity. It may be conceded that governments as such can not at their mere behest create values or maintain parity. Such is not the function, the province, or the power of government, speaking with accurate and critical precision.

It is true that Congress alone has power to coin money. But when so coined Congress is absolved from all responsibility as to the value or parity of the money.

DEMAND GIVES VALUE.

An act of Congress authorizing the free coinage of gold and silver and making them a lawful legal tender for debts at 16 to 1 will not, strictly speaking, give value to either.

It is the demand for money which gives value to money.

Congress alone can, by coinage, make silver available to meet an already existing and unsatisfied demand for money. When so made available it is this demand for money which will give value to the silver coin, and not the act of legislation.

The present silver dollar does not derive its value beyond the bullion price from any acts of legislation or any Government pledge.

Without the demand for money, omnipresent and insatiate, which preceded as well as attended and followed the enactment of the law which authorized their coinage, then such law would have been utterly impotent to add a penny to the value of the silver out of which the dollars were coined.

A bimetallic law passed by Congress will not suffice, but such a law with the concurring condition of demand will achieve the desired result. We have now in this country one-half billion silver dollars, lawful tenders for debt at the ratio of 16 to 1 with gold; as against these dollars we have $60,000,000,000 of debts. Excluding other kinds of money, for debt-paying purposes alone there are 120 units of demand for every dollar in silver. Every such dollar is a prize for which there are 120 competitors. There is $4,000,000,000 worth of silver in the world. If under free coinage it were all brought here and coined there would still be $15 of indebtedness for every dollar in silver. Such is all the silver which has accumulated as the result of all the mining which has been carried on since the world began. How long must the world endure before it shall accumulate sufficient silver to equal the amount of our debts?

EUROPE NEEDS IT.

And the demand in Europe will hold all their coined silver there at the ratio of 15½ to 1. We can not get it. Asia, true to the practice of all her past, will retain her present supply and compete for the future product. No flood of silver will ever be seen. Under free coinage, so long as silver is in the slightest degree below par as compared with gold, the entire demand for money for payment of debts will fall upon silver. When at par the demand will rest indifferently upon both.

Thus, not our Government, but our people, in their demand for money will maintain the parity, and in this they will have the cooperation and assistance, not of foreign governments, but of the people of foreign governments with whom they do business and carry on trade. If this nation says that if there is a disparity between gold and silver its people shall have the privilege of paying in the cheaper metal, the world will know that it is too great to be coerced and potent enough to fulfill its promises. Foreign creditors and nations at once become interested in preventing disparity and thereby avoiding the loss which they would otherwise suffer.

Bimetalism is an automatic means of adjustment by which increasing demand falls upon diminishing value, and diminishing demand falls upon increasing value, thus restoring equilibrium and maintaining equality.

Supply and demand, the great centripetal and centrifugal forces of commerce, under bimetalism, will give value, maintain parity, prevent the divergency of the commercial from the legal ratio, as certainly as the great, analogous, countervailing forces in nature prevent the planets from flying from their orbits.

NO ONE WRONGED.

Will the free use of silver as well as gold for money cheat or defraud anyone of his just rights? If so, how?

The silver dollars under free coinage will be issued from the mints on precisely the same terms, so far as their use in business and for payment of debts is concerned, as the silver coin now in existence has been issued. Two or three million dollars per month coined under existing law pass into circulation unperceived. The like amount, or any increased amount likely to be issued from the mints under free coinage, would be similarly absorbed.

If these dollars were used for the payment of debts, in the hands of the creditor, they would have a value, a purchasing power, a command over all the necessities, conveniences, and luxuries of life, over everything that tends to the comfort of man or the elevation of the race—far greater, on the average, than was possessed by the dollars with which he parted in the creation of the debt. Then the creditor would have no right to complain. Such coinage would tend to arrest the fall of prices and would prove an inestimable boon to those now unable to carry on business, without continual loss, upon a falling market.

It would encourage investments in property and productive industry, and afford opportunity for employment to millions who might otherwise be in enforced idleness. It would lure money hoarded from its hiding place and set it to work honestly to perform the purposes for which money was designed—to effect exchanges, to facilitate trade, vitalize commerce, and stimulate to a higher and better civilization.

The money thus added by the use of silver would probably do no more than stay the downward tendency of prices. The added increment of currency would not compete with the existing money supply, but would readily find new fields of duty, new channels for employment, such fields being now unfruitful, lending no aid to human sustenance for lack of money.

Yet who can estimate the value to our people, to mankind, of the stable and uniform level of prices thus secured and maintained? Such money would be sound, not a delusive shibboleth, but in the highest and best sense of the word.

In view of the foregoing considerations, the provisions of the proposed legislation can be regarded with no milder emotion than that of astonishment. It is almost inconceivable that at this crisis of actual and threatened financial crash and general bankruptcy, due to arrested money supply, the evil consequences are by pernicious legislation to be multiplied upon the heads of the people.

SECTION 1. The standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 23.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

If such is now the standard, why this vain and idle declaration?

If gold is not now the sole standard, why this false pretense except to mislead and deceive the people as to the effect of the legislation, to console them with the false assurance that they will not be worse off after than before the passage of this law?

The effect of the next provision is manifest:

SEC. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States, as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public or private, for the payment of money, shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

The interest-bearing obligations of the United States July 1, 1890, were $1,046,048,750, all by the express terms of the contract and existing law now payable in gold or silver coin at the existing ratio.

By a message of President Cleveland in February, 1895, we are told that the difference in the market value of bonds amounting to $62,315,435, running thirty years, if payable in gold alone instead of coin, amounted to $16,174,770. Thus at this ratio upon the entire debt the Federal taxpaying people of the United States have paid ample consideration for the contract and legal right, while fulfilling every obligation of honesty and honor to pay in either gold or silver. This bill proposes to transfer this advantage of unestimated millions from the people to the bondholders.

Next, this bill proposes to convert the United States notes or greenbacks ($346,000,000) and the Treasury notes ($90,000,000), expressly payable in coin (both legal tender for debts and circulating as money), into debts to be paid in gold or to be turned into bonds bearing interest to be paid in gold. All the disadvantage and cost of this to the people it would be hard to calculate. It curtails the circulation about one-third, leading to a corresponding depression of values and enhancement of all indebtedness, both public and private. The increase in the burden of debt and interest is not pleasant to contemplate by a tax-ridden people.

The final clause of section 2 is amazing in the ruthless robbery of the debtor for the benefit of the creditor which it is its object to bring about. It proposes the violation of the obligation of contracts and of every precept of constitutional and moral ethics.

If the parties have stipulated to pay in paper or silver or gold any or all it will not avail. Thus millions of people are to be spoiled by this arbitrary edict of legislation.

The proviso to section 2, that the legal-tender quality of silver is not to be interfered with, being in a flat contradiction of the entire purpose and other express provisions of the act both preceding and following it, would by the courts be declared a nullity according to the maxim "Ut res magis valebat."

Now let us look into the effect of the subsequent provisions of the bill. There is much verbiage. But it all reduces to this: The Secretary of the Treasury is given an uncontrolled power to increase the national debt by the sale of bonds to be paid in gold, and with the gold thus or otherwise obtained redeem all outstanding greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver certificates, which July 1, 1899, aggregated $803,005,223.

When all this paper is thus covered into the Treasury it can only again be paid out in exchange for gold, and must thereafter stand as nothing more than a certificate that so much gold has been deposited in the Treasury. None of this paper or the silver dollars ($563,697,082) or the national bank notes now out or which may be issued will, after the passage of this bill, be available for the payment of debts if the creditor declines to receive it, because the first section requires that all debts, public and private, must be paid in gold. Every obligation payable in money is to be deemed payable in gold.

This is not true of the Senate substitute. The Senate substitute provides carefully, at the expense of the people, that the bondholders shall have their obligations payable specifically in gold coin. It takes care of the bondholders, who are mainly the banks, but it does not also take care of the great masses of the people. It provides that the bank notes issued by these people shall be payable in lawful money. In this sense the House bill is more universal and impartial in its operation. The Senate substitute discriminates wholly in favor of one class as against another.

Gold, in a word, is to be the only money. Whereas the total money or circulation in the United States July 1, 1899, as given by the Secretary of the Treasury, was $2,745,350,508, if this bill passes it will be only $903,498,384, being the amount of gold in the country according to the latest, though probably excessive, estimate of the Director of the Mint.

Thus the money which the debtor may lawfully tender in payment of his obligations will be reduced to one-third its present proportions.

The gold will be quite exhausted for use in the arts, for foreign exchange, and to supply the Treasury and bank reserves. The substituted bank notes will not be available for debt-paying purposes without the consent of the creditor.

Every man, every business, every industry in debt will thus be stricken down by this law and lie paralyzed and helpless at the feet of the creditor.

As under the proposed act the banks may issue bank notes to the par value of the United States bonds which they acquire, and as the Government is bound by law to accept bank notes when tendered in payment of dues to it, if issued the bonds may be obtained by banks without cost to them and upon which they may draw the interest as it accrues without a cent's outlay on their part. Therefore the banks have every inducement to turn into the Treasury all outstanding paper money and demand redemption in gold and thus force the issue of bonds. When the country is so reduced to the gold basis and flooded with bank notes, it will, in the first crisis, be found that the amount of gold is wholly inadequate for their payment.

Specie payments will accordingly be suspended and the business of the entire country will be at the mercy of the bankers' trust.

What will happen? What must happen? Is it possible for the ingenuity of man to devise and seriously undertake to consummate a scheme so appalling in its probable effects, so pregnant with infinite mischief? Like the hungry she wolf, there is abroad the voracious monster of greed, boundless in rapacity. Its subtle influence has benumbed the public conscience. The high ideals and benign example of those who with infinite sacrifice laid the foundation of the free institutions of the Republic are no longer potent in high places, but the objects of sneer and derision.

If justice and right now held sway, the forces here dictating legislation in these sacred Halls would take refuge in flight; if principle were predominant, they would turn tail. But, as it is, mention honesty to them and they but laugh at you. Rolling centuries end with the culmination of their audacity. So this brazen fraud will be written upon the statute book to ever after blacken the annals of the Republic.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 200 copies of the annual report upon the improvement and care of public buildings and grounds and the care and maintenance of the Washington Monument in the District of Columbia, being Appendix 300 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1898, and 200 copies of the annual report upon the improvement and care of public buildings and grounds and the care and maintenance of the Washington Monument in the District of Columbia, being Appendix 300 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1899, for the use of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

DIGEST OF DECISIONS AND PRECEDENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. From the Committee on Printing I report back unanimously, without amendment, the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] December 19, 1890, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document 278, second session Fifty-third Congress, the same being a "Digest of decisions and precedents of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, relating to their powers and privileges respecting their members and officers, and to investigations, contempts, libels, contumacious witnesses, expulsions," etc., as revised and new matter added, together with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there anything there to indicate by whom this compilation was made?

Mr. PLATT of New York. I do not think it is indicated. All the work has been performed and the new matter incorporated as suggested by the special committee on the sugar-trust inquiry. The manuscript is brought down to date and includes all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the court of appeals, and the supreme court of the District of Columbia on what are known as the sugar-trust cases, and it also includes additional matter touching the powers and privileges of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is a valuable work, undoubtedly, but I only wanted to know by whom the work had been done.

Mr. PLATT of New York. This document is especially desired by the House of Representatives on account of the pendency of the Roberts case, but the manuscript, as completed, is in the custody of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he proposes to have printed the decisions of the nisi prius courts in the District of Columbia on the sugar cases?

Mr. PLATT of New York. I can not answer as to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought I heard some Senator say that that was the purpose.

Mr. PLATT of New York. The resolution states exactly what it is desired to have printed. The resolution can be read again.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to object to the passage of the resolution, and I shall not do so, but I wish to submit an observation in connection with its submission to the Senate that I think is timely and I believe to be wise.

Mr. President, these precedents are without any value. Since I have been a member of the Senate, which is now going on seven years, with a few months' interruption, I have never seen a precedent followed in this Chamber. No man alive can tell what constitutes private or public legislation according to our rules. There have been five or six different rulings upon that subject, according to the caprice and whim of the presiding officer at the time.

Private legislation, Mr. President, is that legislation which affects private interests. Public legislation is that legislation which affects public interests. The distinction between the two kinds of legislation, according to the law books, is marked and distinct. No man, whether he is lawyer or layman, ought to stumble in determining the question. There are no two decisions in these precedents alike upon that subject.

So far as the sugar cases are concerned, Mr. President, that investigation was brought about by a resolution introduced by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to investigate some matters happening in New York, and an amendment was offered by myself, which was adopted, to investigate the sugar scandal. That was the principal thing investigated in 1894 under that resolution.

The committee of investigation, of which I was a member, was composed, I think, exclusively of lawyers, with one exception. We had some difficulty in getting witnesses. To my surprise, and I am used to surprises, I was informed by distinguished legal talent at that time that neither the Senate of the United States nor any other legislative body had power to protect itself by compulsory process and to inflict punishment upon derelict witnesses or contumacious witnesses for refusing to answer the process of the Senate or the committee.

That question was argued to some slight extent in the Chamber by Senators whose names I do not now recall. I think one of them was our late Senator from Oregon, Mr. Dolph, upon resolutions to bring the contumacious witnesses before the Senate and compel them to answer questions they had refused to answer before the committee, and as I recollect it the resolutions failed of passage in consequence of the widespread idea that the only power the Senate possessed was under a statute which was passed, I think, in 1857, or at least in antebellum days, to the effect that a man might be indicted in this District for a failure to answer proper questions put to him by an investigating committee.

Those witnesses were indicted under that statute in the District of Columbia and put upon their trial. One of them was tried before a judge and a jury and was convicted and sentenced to some forty days in the common jail of this District for a failure to answer. Two or three of them were tried elsewhere, and, to the utter amazement, I think, of the legal world, one of the judges held that the defendant could not be convicted because he had not been subpoenaed before the committee, although he appeared before the committee and was subject to its jurisdiction, and did not raise the question of his exemption at the time and followed the course of other witnesses.

Then, I think, he held also, if I am correctly informed (and I speak of this more particularly because I want the country lawyers, who are not supposed to know as much as these distinguished jurists, to understand it), that the witness could not be convicted because a question was put to him by one member of the committee which was not voted upon and sanctioned openly by the committee at the time, as though a question put by a member of an investigating committee which was not dissented from was not to be construed to be the question of the committee.

In other and perhaps in plainer words, Mr. President, that distinguished jurist and scintillating legal genius held that it was necessary for the entire committee to take up a question which was to be submitted to one of these witnesses and say, "That is the question of the committee," before it is put to him and before he would be responsible for contempt in failing to answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Where was that held?

Mr. ALLEN. That was held right in the district court of the District of Columbia by one of the present judges of that court. Mr. President, it would seem impossible, or at least preposterous, that any man who had the qualifications to occupy the position of judge of a high court of record at the national capital would either be so ignorant of the primary principles of the laws of evidence and of the laws of jurisdiction as to be guilty of a ruling of that kind.

Now, all this book of precedents is studded with stuff of that kind. Stuff is the proper expression. Of what earthly value is it? Do you want to send it to your constituents? Do I want to send it to mine? There is not a boy in the State of Nebraska who has been in a law office six weeks to whom I would send one of those books. It would mislead him. It would be an imposition upon his intelligence. I would not want him to take it in his hands or examine it.

Then, Mr. President, this book is to contain, or it used to contain, certain decisions which held that the courts of the United States had no power to make a man disclose his own complicity with questionable transactions, whether they were criminal or otherwise, if they reflected in the slightest degree upon his integrity, because, it was said, it is unconstitutional to make a man testify against himself. It is not unconstitutional to make a man testify against himself. There are some States which have constitutions of that kind.

The Constitution of the United States Government, Mr. President, is a constitution of enumerated powers. It is a government that is created, and that did not exist until the Constitution was adopted. It differs from a State constitution because the constitution of a State is a limitation upon power, and if a power is not limited expressly or impliedly by the constitution of the State it exists and adheres in the State. That is not the rule respecting the Constitution of the United States. So I say there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which recognizes the rule that is recognized by some of these decisions.

So it comes to this, Mr. President, that whenever a man has cognizance of a questionable transaction which may in the slightest degree reflect upon his personal conduct, however important it may be to the Government to have his evidence, when he is called into court and a question is put to him, "Oh," he says, "that subjects me to the criticism of the people; it reflects upon my integrity, and any question of that kind I shall not answer," and the court is powerless to compel him to answer.

Mr. President, the true rule is—and it was the rule recognized by the English people and the English courts—that that which would incriminate a man and subject him to public infamy as a consequence of his crime he was not compelled to disclose in a case that would lead to his conviction or to his prosecution. There never was any other rule in this country or in Great Britain until it was recognized by some of the decisions that it is proposed to incorporate in this work of precedents. It would not be as valuable, Mr. President, except as a curiosity, as a Jayne's almanac of thirty years ago; it would not be half as valuable.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this matter came up some time ago while I was chairman of the Committee on Printing. There is now in existence Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 278, which is a digest of the decisions and precedents of the Senate and House of Representatives in regard to their powers and privileges and election cases. But that was published in the Fifty-third Congress and has not been brought up to date. In fact, I think it is pretty much out of print. There was a demand for this work, and at the time of the sugar-trust inquiry, when that committee of investigation sat, and both the Senator from Nebraska and myself were members of it, that committee felt that there was great need of bringing the precedents up to date, and the clerk of that committee, Mr. Smith, who had charge of the work of the committee, undertook, at the suggestion of that special committee, to complete that digest, which he did, and it is all ready now.

I reported the resolution for the printing, and it went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and was reported back favorably and went to the Calendar. It was not acted on at the first session, but was taken up at the second session and agreed to. It was then found that the cost would exceed more than $500, and therefore had to be an act of both Houses. I reported a concurrent resolution for that purpose, but by a mistake the resolution was referred back to the committee instead of being placed upon the Calendar. In the meantime the House committee had agreed to a similar resolution and reported it to the House. The book has been a useful one in the past as a book of reference merely, which is all that it is.

I do not think I disagree at all with the Senator from Nebraska in his view of certain decisions which have been made here by a judge of one of the District courts in regard to questions which came up under the sugar-trust cases; but it seems to me the merit of those decisions does not affect the usefulness of the book. It is merely to get into a convenient form precedents and decisions to which there is constantly a necessity to refer.

As I have said, the resolution has been agreed to once by the Senate, and as it passed through my hands several times and I examined it I was satisfied that it was very desirable to have a reprint of this document, bringing the decisions down to date. Just at this moment there is an especial demand for the document in the House of Representatives. As is well known, they have a case there involving a great many questions of the privileges and powers of the Houses. I think the document is out of print, and I know that the House is very anxious to have it. I make this explanation because all of this thing went through the committee and through my hands before the Senator from New York took charge of it.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the particular parts of this publication that I should like to see eliminated are the decisions in the sugar cases outside of the Chapman Case. The Chapman Case was tried before Judge Cox, and went before the District court of appeals or the District supreme court, and finally to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have no objection, and I think it will be probably wise to incorporate those three decisions and the precedents into this book; but the nisi prius trials in the other cases, that went off on the rulings I have spoken of, I think ought not to be printed and ought not to be circulated.

Mr. LODGE. Of course that would come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing, and I have no doubt if the Senator from Nebraska will call the attention of the Senator from New York to that point when the book is going through the press the parts which the Senator considers objectionable could be perfectly well omitted. I do not suppose it was intended to put anything in the book except the decisions of the courts.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to bargain with the Senator from New York upon this matter. I do not want to object to the passage of the resolution, but I should like to have some indication that the decisions to which I refer are not to be incorporated in the document.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there is no question whatever that the digest, if properly prepared, will be an important work. It would bring together the decisions and precedents upon a particular subject which has been of great interest at many times in the past and will doubtless be in the future. It will be a great aid to Senators, lawyers, and laymen to be able to find collated in one book the decisions and precedents upon the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. Like Barbour's New York Reports?

Mr. SPOONER. Like any digest. It is a new doctrine to me that decisions upon the subject should be eliminated from the digest because this Senator or that Senator or the other Senator happens to think that they were not good law. We might just as well make a digest and omit from it decisions which have been reversed or modified.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. If I have stated correctly the two propositions upon which one or two cases were decided, does the Senator think the decisions would be valuable as precedents?

Mr. SPOONER. No matter what I think, whether the reasoning of the court was justified or not, they are precedents upon the subject, and there may be lawyers who think they are justified.

Mr. ALLEN. Are they justified and are they in accordance with the established decisions and precedents?

Mr. SPOONER. Who was the judge?

Mr. ALLEN. I am somewhat modest about mentioning his name.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Nebraska had, while on the bench since he went out of the Senate, delivered an opinion upon some question of this kind, I should have wanted it included, even though I did not agree with him. I would ordinarily want all the law there is upon the subject. The Senate is not bound to follow that decision, and no other court is bound to follow the decision; but it is the contribution of a man presumably learned, and I think learned, and who is, I have no doubt, honest upon the subject. So I think it should be included. It belongs legitimately in such a digest. I should like to have included in the digest every pertinent decision made by any court in the country.

I understand there was an opinion delivered in the case which may be useful to lawyers who may wish to consult it hereafter. Some may disagree with it, others may agree with it, but in any event it forms a part of the law upon the subject. By the reasoning of my friend from Nebraska perhaps there are other decisions which he is willing to have included which I regard as very bad law and therefore, from his standpoint, ought to ask to have excluded. We ought to make this a complete digest.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator does not affirm whether he believes that is good law or not.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the proposition to which the Senator refers?

Mr. ALLEN. Where a judge held that a witness being before a tribunal and a question being put to him which is proper in itself, the witness may decline to answer because he was not subpoenaed before that tribunal. That is one proposition which I should like to have the Senator affirm or disaffirm.

Mr. SPOONER. I think if the witness appeared before the committee and took the oath, he should answer.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; this opinion holds the reverse.

Mr. SPOONER. That is where that judge and I differ, as I have differed with a great many judges.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, and I am satisfied I was right a while ago.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator by that admission does his perspicacity credit.

Mr. ALLEN. The second proposition he affirmed was this: There being five or six members of the committee, each putting questions to the witness in person, all the others sitting as a body, without interruption and with the tacit consent of their associates, the judge held—

Mr. SPOONER. Was the question objected to by counsel for the witness?

Mr. ALLEN. No; nobody objected to it.

Mr. TELLER. Except the court.

Mr. ALLEN. The judge held that the decision was improper; that the witness had a right to decline to answer, and was not indictable under the statute, because the question did not have the active sanction of the members of the committee or the affirmative expression of their approval at the time it was put. Does the Senator hold that good law and worthy of perpetuation?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is worthy of discussion.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SPOONER. I think whether a man can be put in contempt for a failure to answer a question and the foundation be laid for a criminal proceeding might, perhaps, with some reason require some preliminary proceeding or action of the committee as a committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the proper course for a member of the committee to pursue, I suppose, would be, "May I put such and such a question?"

Mr. SPOONER. I say it is debatable.

Mr. ALLEN. And if a majority say yes, then you put the question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. But if you put the question and the members of the committee sit there and do not object, and nobody objects, that is not the question of the committee?

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is a question that might admit of argument on both sides.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think so.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

Mr. McCOMAS. If the Senator will yield to me a moment, the decision referred to in the nisi prius court was in a case almost of first impressions argued on either side by very able counsel, and perhaps presents the best accessible compendium of kindred discussions of the immediate question that can be had. That is one good reason why a decision of the nisi prius court upon a question which is new, unreversed, unappealed from, is the best accessible information, and there is a special reason, I submit with deference to the Senator from Nebraska, why this particular matter should be printed.

It is that the Senator from Nebraska has with very great success endeavored to state what was decided. I shall not, at a quarter after 5 in the afternoon, undertake to state my apprehension of the decision upon the two points by Justice Bradley; but when the Senator from Nebraska shall see them in print, as he may if this resolution passes, he will find that he has been quite unsuccessful and could have saved himself nearly all the comments which he has here made upon a state of facts and the rulings thereon, which are far from the decision, and certainly far from the reasoning of that learned justice.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it would be useful to have the facts stated in this digest if any court has made any such decision, because it will put committees on their guard, and it will be very easy for a committee to obviate any such question. It seems to me that the resolution ought to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported by the Senator from New York.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from New York desires the floor, I will yield to him, of course.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I only wished to ask that the vote be taken upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I admit that these decisions would be valuable as curiosities, and that would be their chief if not their only merit. When the Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] says that the decisions would be valuable as bringing together a compendium of discussion pro and con upon the first proposition, which I understood him to say is without precedent, I beg to call his attention to the fact that that question has been decided by the courts of this country years and years ago in scores and scores of cases.

The Senator from Maryland had the honor—and he worthily filled the position, I have no doubt—of presiding over one of the courts of record in this District for some years. I dare say that the Senator never made a decision, or never entertained the idea of making a decision, that a witness who had been sworn and was on the stand of a court could refuse to answer a question properly put to him by counsel because he had not been subpoenaed; and he would not have stopped, had the witness so declined, to look up precedents as to his power to punish that witness for contempt. That question is older than the Senator from Maryland and myself put together.

The other question, Mr. President, is equally without excuse, in my judgment. It may be, as the Senator from Maryland says, that I am misquoting the decision. I am speaking simply from my recollection; but I shall be glad, if I find myself mistaken, to address a letter of apology to the jurist who presided at that trial and to state publicly that I was mistaken. I have no compunction about things of that kind. Of course, there is not a person living who has sense enough to perform the ordinary functions of nature who does not know that the power to punish a contempt is an inherent power in every court and in every tribunal, whether the power be expressly conferred or not.

Suppose, Mr. President, this Chamber were invaded at this moment by three or four armed and lawless men, with the intention of breaking up its proceedings. Are we without any remedy or without any power except to call the Sergeant-at-Arms and his able and brave assistants to remove the invaders? After they have been so removed have we no power to bring them before the bar of the Senate and try them for contempt and pronounce judgment against them?

That is the argument which has been drifting along in this Chamber for five or six years to my knowledge, and yet we are told that precedents that uphold a doctrine so monstrous and so inexcusable have value in them. They have value exactly as a menagerie has value as affording an opportunity to look upon and examine the curios. That is all.

Now, if the honorable Senator from New York desires to put the precedents I have spoken of into this volume and send them broadcast throughout the land to corrupt the legal education of young men who are being educated for the law, he may do so, but I do not want any of them to invade my territory. We are undertaking to raise intelligent boys who will be a credit to the world wherever they go, who will have an education that is of some value, which will make them forces for good and intelligence in the communities in which they reside, and we do not want any of this kind of law scattered among them to corrupt their ideas of jurisprudence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution reported by the Senator from New York. The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

NOTICE OF EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on to-morrow at as early an hour as possible I shall move an executive session.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of the executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6.05 p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 16, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 15, 1900.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 15, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 12, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following credentials:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
Frankfort, December 23, 1899.

The undersigned, a board for examining and canvassing the returns of an election held on Monday, the 18th day of December, 1899, for the purpose of electing a Representative to fill a vacancy in the Congress of the United States from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of Kentucky, do certify that June W. Gayle received the highest number of the votes given for that office, as certified to the secretary of state, and is therefore duly and regularly elected for the term prescribed by the Constitution.

WILLIAM S. PRYOR, Chairman,
WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Member,
CHAS. B. POYNTZ, Member,

State Board of Elections Commissioners for the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Attest:

C. R. CHENAULT,

Secretary State Board of Elections Commissioners.

The Hon. June W. Gayle, a Representative-elect from the State of Kentucky, appeared at the bar of the House accompanied by his colleague, Mr. BERRY, of Kentucky.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to introduce my colleague, Hon. June W. Gayle, a Representative-elect from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of Kentucky.

The oath of office was accordingly administered to Mr. Gayle.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Leave was granted Mr. MOODY of Oregon to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Wilbur F. Cogswell, Fifty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report a bill making appropriations to supply the urgent deficiencies in the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and prior years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged report, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and prior years.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I reserve all points of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order. The bill will be ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I will ask the House to take this bill under consideration to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws I present the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws have leave to sit during the sessions of the House during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I observe that quite a number of the committees ask for this privilege, which is unusual. Unless there is some reason for it I do not think the committee should have this right to sit during the session.

Mr. WARNER. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is ample reason for this request. We have one bill containing 506 pages to go over, and it will be absolutely necessary to sit during the sessions of the House if we are to get through with the work.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Five hundred and ninety-six pages in one bill?

Mr. WARNER. In one bill, to say nothing of the others.

Mr. LLOYD. And there is another bill that has nearly 800 pages. So that we have two bills before us at the present time, covering nearly 1,000 pages, that must be carefully investigated, and we have not time to do it unless we sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

WAR VESSELS ON THE LAKES.

Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. No. 13) requesting the Secretary of State to furnish information to the House as to the status of the agreement between the United States and Great Britain which prohibits the building of or maintaining of more than a single war vessel on the Great Lakes, reports the same back with an amendment, as follows: In line 3 strike out the word "report" and insert in lieu thereof the word "communicate," and with the recommendation that the resolution as amended be adopted.

The original resolution is as follows:
"Whereas the Secretary of the Navy has decided that contractors owning or managing shipyards on the Great Lakes are not eligible to bid for the construction of war vessels because of the existence of a prohibitory agreement between the United States and Great Britain: Therefore, be it Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House the status of the agreement between the United States and Great Britain said to prohibit the building, arming, or maintaining of more than a single war vessel on the Great Lakes, such information to include all data bearing upon the subject now in the possession of the Department."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New Hampshire will permit me, he is doubtless aware of the fact that a full and exhaustive report was filed in December, 1892, upon this very question. Can he state whether other facts have developed since that time which make this resolution necessary?

Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, the Committee have made the resolution broad enough to deal with the entire subject—

Mr. BURTON. I only ask the question, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me that we have passed the inquiry stage in this matter and ought to act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report back the bill H. R. 4470, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, is directed by that committee to report back to the House the bill H. R. 4470, and to recommend that the same be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

SCHOOLS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from white citizens of the Indian Territory, requesting Congress to provide an educational system for the Territory, and to make suitable appropriation therefor. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, so that the House may have information upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from citizens of the Indian Territory on the subject of education. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorial is as follows:

PROCEEDINGS OF THE INDIAN TERRITORY PUBLIC SCHOOLS ASSOCIATION IN CONVENTION ASSEMBLED AT PURCELL, IND. T., ON THE 2D DAY OF DECEMBER A. D. 1899.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Indian Territory Public Schools Association, in convention assembled at Purcell, Ind. T., on the 2d day of December, A. D. 1899, adopted the following resolutions:

Be it resolved by the people of the Indian Territory, assembled at the Public Schools Convention at Purcell, Ind. T., That

Whereas in every other State and Territory in the United States Congress and the State governments have abundantly provided for a permanent public-school fund by proceeds arising from sale and rental of vast areas of public lands; by proceeds of lands and other property and effects that may accrue by escheat, and from sale of estrays; from unclaimed dividends or distributive shares of the estates of deceased persons; also all grants, gifts, or devises that have been or may hereafter be made to the Government and not otherwise appropriated by the tenure of the grant, gift or devise, and by fines in many instances, which continually add to said permanent fund which is invested or loaned and the interest or income each year distributed to counties or school districts, according to per capita, without regard to the wealth of such county or district, and being often sufficient to maintain a school in each district several months in each year, unaided by local taxation; and

Whereas in every other State and Territory in the United States local taxation may be voted or assessed by the people therein residing on the lands, and personal property, by a tax on occupation, and a per capita tax sufficient to maintain public schools from three to ten months in the year; and

Whereas the United States, on taking charge and control in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Manila, in the Philippine Islands, have at once and without delay established public schools, free to all residents, and has provided for the maintenance thereof, showing its confidence and firm belief in the maxim, too true to be denied, viz, that intelligence and virtue are the safeguards of liberty and the bulwark of a free and good government; and that in order to establish and maintain a free and stable, good government, the youth must be properly educated and able soon to discharge intelligently and virtuously the duties of citizens and fitly handle affairs of state when the army and navy are withdrawn; and

Whereas there is now residing in the Indian Territory fully 200,000 white and negro people, not Indians, which number is rapidly increasing, and it is no longer questioned that these people will remain and be a permanent part of the population; and

Whereas Congress has the government and control of the Indian Territory, and especially of the white and negro people residing therein, and there is no permanent school fund to assist in maintaining public schools in the Territory; no provision or authority at all for establishing and maintaining public schools in the country districts; little or no real estate taxable for years to come; a people poor in wealth, whose children are growing up in ignorance, and too often in crime; whose cities and towns have no school houses or apparatus, and are handicapped by imperfect laws borrowed by job lot, regardless of applicability to conditions here: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we petition Congress for Federal aid to be granted at once; that in lieu of land grants made to other States and Territories a certain and specific sum be appropriated each year, or for a number of years, to be distributed to districts or communities per capita of persons between the ages of 6 and 21 years; that a more widely extended system of public schools be established—one that will reach all the children in town and country of school age.

We are living here. Our children are growing up to manhood and womanhood and are anxious to be educated. We earnestly desire that they shall be intelligent and virtuous and make good, useful, and respected American citizens. We are trying to help ourselves and are willing to be taxed, but ask and believe that we are entitled to that or its equivalent accorded the people in other States and Territories. We believe that if Federal aid is given us in a substantial and liberal way at once, crime will rapidly lessen and a great saving result in expenses of administering the criminal courts here.

In the cities and towns under the Curtis Act the highest aggregate rate of taxation is 2 per cent for all purposes whatever. The real estate is not taxable and can be only to a very limited extent for years to come. The improvements, in most instances, are not of a valuable or substantial nature, as most people have been unwilling to risk valuable buildings on lands belonging to an Indian tribe. It follows, therefore, that the bulk of the taxes must of necessity be raised for running the city government, public schools, keeping the streets in order, maintaining fire protection—a most difficult and costly problem here—providing for waterworks and sewerage, by a tax strictly on personal property. The bulk of this is in form of stocks of merchandise.

Under the Indian laws now being enforced by the United States Government all business men are required to pay a tax of 1 per cent or more on capital invested. The law is, in fact, more onerous, as it is 1 per cent on every invoice of goods handled; but the Indians exact it only on the capital invested and Uncle Sam winks, so to speak, at this liberal (?) concession.

The Indian governments in some nations require each non-citizen over the age of 18 years to pay $1 each year and a tax on horses and cattle and much other property where a family has more than two of a kind. As there are no laws for working the roads in the country leading to and from the towns, there is virtually a tax on business men of the town for the purpose of building and repairing the roads, bridges, etc., to encourage trade with the towns, and all towns act accordingly. The Indian governments do not provide for these matters at all. Therefore the business man figures, and rightfully, that he starts out with almost a 2 per cent tax before the city government gets hold of him.

We find our right to issue bonds in cities or towns for the purpose of building schoolhouses, etc., is doubtful, if not entirely denied, and ask a special law authorizing such bonds to be issued.

We believe the children living in the Indian Territory, in the heart of the United States, are entitled to at least as much consideration as those in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Manila, and earnestly ask Congress to act promptly in their behalf.

Respectfully submitted.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions, together with the address of Hon. John D. Benedict, delivered before the association, be printed, and that copies of the same be sent to individual Congressmen of the United States and to the Committees on Indian Affairs of both the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, with special request that the same be presented to Congress and the resolutions and address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the end that Congress may be made acquainted with the lamentable conditions existing in the Indian Territory, as set forth in said resolutions and address.

NEED OF EDUCATION.

[Address delivered by Hon. John D. Benedict, superintendent of schools, before the Public Schools Association at Purcell December 2, 1893.]

Generally speaking, there are two theories of government. The first is that in which all power is vested in the crown or monarch; the second is that in which all power is vested in the people and is exercised through representative bodies chosen by them.

Under the old monarchical form of government the people were considered as vassals or slaves, and the peace and permanence of the government depended largely upon the ability of the rulers to keep their subjects in ignorance. Education was not general, but was limited to the select few who were chosen to carry out the wishes of the king. When Charles I, who was King of England at the time of our earliest settlements in Massachusetts and Connecticut, stood upon the scaffold, sentenced to death by the English Parliament, it is said that in his dying breath he declared that the people's right was only to have their life and property, a share in the Government being nothing pertaining to them." Persecuted by such a tyrant, it is no wonder that the Pilgrim Fathers were prompt in incorporating the other theory of government into their organic laws by proclaiming that the people are the rightful source of all power.

One of those early fathers wrote as follows: "After God had carried us safely to New England and we had builded our homes, provided necessities for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship, and settled the civil government, one of the next things we looked and longed after was to advance learning and perpetuate it to our posterity." Thus was the importance of an intelligent, educated citizenship recognized in the very beginning of our American governments. If the people were to rule, the people must be educated.

"We must educate or we must perish," exclaimed one of our early patriots, and the echoes of his voice have rolled down through the years, gathering added force and importance with each succeeding generation.

Why, it may be asked, did it become so necessary in America to educate all the people?

First. In a republican form of government the exercise of the right to vote demanded an intelligent citizenship; numerous and important political questions have arisen, and will continue to arise so long as free government exists, which require intelligence on the part of the voter to properly settle. As every citizen is alike affected by the legislation and policies of the government, it may be truthfully said that the welfare of every individual depends, in some degree, upon the degree of intelligence or education possessed by the voter. It has been and should continue to be the policy of our Government to increase and multiply the number of intelligent, educated citizens, so that they may be able to overcome the influence of those electors who are too often misguided by prejudice or ignorance.

Second. Our Constitution makes it the duty of every citizen, between certain ages, to bear arms in defense of his country in time of war, and need only to refer to the events of our late war with Spain to prove the superiority of an educated soldiery, inspired by feelings of patriotism, over the standing armies of other nations, composed of ignorant or mercenary men, who are mere hirelings.

Third. The right and duty which the State imposes upon its citizens to act as jurors is a serious, solemn obligation which demands an intelligent citizenship. Your property, your reputation, your life may be placed in the hands of your neighbor who is summoned to sit in the jury box, and you have the right to demand that he possess that degree of intelligence necessary to enable him to carefully weigh the evidence and form his conclusions in accordance with right and justice.

Fourth. The right to hold office is another prerogative of the citizen, and whether the position is a minor or important one some degree of education is necessary in order to enable the official to properly perform the duties imposed upon him. The rights of the people are never secure in the hands of ignorant officials. Designing and unscrupulous men stand ever ready to misguide or corrupt the ignorant and the weak, and the politician who can not convert the thinking man with arguments too often endeavors to influence the ignorant with his unscrupulous appeals to prejudice and passion.

There are some of the solemn, responsible duties which our Government has imposed upon its citizens, and in the exercise of these duties the General Government has constantly urged the necessity of an educated, intelligent citizenship. But we hear it rumored that the Government can do nothing for the education of its future citizens whose lots have been cast in the Indian Territory. Let us hope that that will not be the serious, final decision of the powers that be, when their attention is properly called to the conditions that really exist in this land. Last week I had occasion to drive 35 miles from a certain railroad station in this Territory. On the way I passed through two villages and one well-settled farming community, and nowhere in all that long drive did I find a school of any kind. Within a radius of 2 miles from each of these villages could be found about 100 children, growing up in absolute ignorance. Perhaps it is needless for me to say that they were all white children, for the children of Indian blood have been provided with some educational facilities. These little boys, who are now walking the streets of those villages or wandering aimlessly through the surrounding woods, will sooner or later be called upon by the Government to perform the solemn duties of citizenship which I have already enumerated.

Can the Government safely deem it a matter of indifference whether those boys are being properly fitted and trained for the performance of the important trusts? Will it not endanger the well-being of the community in which such an array of future citizens is allowed to grow up in ignorance? "Ignorance breeds crime," we often hear it said, and does not the Government find that crime is already too prevalent in this section of the country? I had occasion some weeks ago to show a Government official from Washington city some of the sights in and around Muskogee, and among other places of interest he visited the jail, where 250 men, accused of various crimes, were closely packed in a building not large enough to properly accommodate more than half that number. These unfortunate prisoners were projecting their heads through every available space in the doors and windows of the building, each one struggling to get a breath of pure air. As the visitor gazed upon that crowd, he exclaimed, "My God! I never expected to see such a sight as this anywhere in America." Sixty thousand dollars was appropriated by our last Congress for building new jails in the Territory, but not one penny for building new schoolhouses.

The Government is compelled to annually spend many thousands of dollars for catching and convicting criminals in the Territory, but it does not expend one dollar in the prevention of crime.

But it is said that some learned Congressman claims that the Government can not legally come to the rescue of the unfortunate white people of the Territory. Our Government has in the years past donated over 75,000,000 acres of land to the various colleges and universities of the country for the education of white college students, and the student of civil government will search in vain for any provision of our organic law which authorizes Congress to appropriate vast tracts of land while prohibiting it from appropriating money for the education of any class of its citizens. But we hear that some shrewd Congressman says "that it would be establishing a bad precedent to appropriate money for the education of the white children of the Territory; that the State or the Territory, and not the General Government, should provide the funds for establishing and maintaining free schools."

Webster says that "a precedent is something done or said that may authorize a similar subsequent act." So, Mr. Congressman, you need not fear the establishment of a vexatious precedent here, for nowhere else within the limits of our great country are the conditions "similar" to those now existing in this Territory.

You, Mr. Congressman, your associates, and predecessors are responsible for these existing conditions. You created them, and is it possible that you now propose to turn a deaf ear to the appeals of 200,000 white people who now reside in the Territory? Let us hope that some means will be devised by which the pall of ignorance which now enshrouds these people may be removed. The Indians of the Territory are fairly supplied with educational funds and facilities, but no part of their school funds can be used for the education of the white children of the Territory, and they are nontaxable.

The Government should sacredly keep its treaties and obligations with the various Indian nations, but in doing so it need not necessarily ignore the rights and the needs of the white people. This Territory is peculiarly the home of the Indian. But the white man has been lawfully admitted here. He has paid his license to transact business here. He has builded homes and cities and developed farms, and they have vastly enhanced the Indian's allotments. He has built railroads, schoolhouses, churches, erected hotels and business houses. He has created a market for the native products, and if he proves true to his Anglo-Saxon characteristics he is here to stay. Since he has been admitted as a neighbor to the Indian, far better be it for the Indian to have him educated. An educated, intelligent white population can be of great benefit to the Indian, but an ignorant, degraded white man is the Indian's worst enemy.

The American common school is the greatest civilizing force in our midst. Follow the history, growth, and development of any State in the Union, and you will find that as fast as the free school has been reared upon its borders pillage and lawlessness have been crowded without. Not until the common school had gotten well established in Texas was it considered a safe place for a decent man to live. As fast as the little red schoolhouse appeared upon the hilltops and in the valleys of Kansas lawlessness, danger to life and property, disappeared. About a year ago I had occasion to visit the town of Holbrook, Ariz., a place once noted for its everyday crimes. While waiting for a train I sat upon a dry-goods box in front of a store which faced the principal street of the town, engaged in conversation with one of the old pioneers of the place. He told me of the times, not many years ago, when it seemed almost worth a man's life to walk the streets of the town beneath the midday sun. Many a time, he declared, he had seen wild, reckless cowboys gallop down the street, firing their revolvers right and left at everything in sight. Now all this is changed, and Holbrook is as quiet and orderly as the average Western town. "What, in your opinion, has been the cause of this change for the better?" I asked. "Didn't you hear that school bell ring around the corner there? That's it," he replied.

In my recent report to Washington, in referring to this sad condition of the white settlers, I used this language: "Congress ought to be induced to give this matter serious consideration, for conditions here are serious and anomalous. It can not be claimed that Congress would be establishing a dangerous precedent by affording relief to the residents of the Territory, for no other portion of the United States presents circumstances and conditions similar to those existing here. The jails of the Territory are filled to overflowing, and the Government is being urged to build more jails and penitentiaries. Let Congress make it possible to establish free schools in every town and township in the Territory, and crime and criminals will become less expensive to the Government."

The honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Secretary of the Interior in their annual reports have urged Congressional action in this matter, but our Congressmen, in the midst of their multifarious duties, seldom have time to read and consider these reports.

I fear that not until the people cry aloud in the midst of their distress will relief come in any form.

As I look about over this lovely land, and see the numerous little cities and villages heroically struggling to establish free schools, my heart goes out in sympathy for them. If they could issue bonds with which to build schoolhouses, and could levy taxes upon real estate with which to maintain schools, as is customary in the States, they would scorn the idea of seeking aid from any outside source. But these things are impossible under present conditions. What, then, can be done?

First, There should be such an educational awakening aroused as will enlist the active interest of every parent in the Territory in the education of his children. Many are too careless and indifferent concerning the welfare of their children. Hundreds of boys are now aimlessly roaming the streets and woods, girls are being reared in indolence and ignorance, who might, even now, by proper exertion on the part of their parents, be in attendance at some good school. Every parent should be thoroughly impressed with the fact that it is a burning shame and an everlasting disgrace to bring up a child in ignorance, where, by any possible means, that child could be given any educational privileges or advantages. Prosperous and public-spirited men throughout the Territory should be encouraged and urged to contribute their means and their influence toward helping those who are helpless, and toward stirring up those who are indifferent.

Second, As to how Congress can be induced to come to our aid, it seems to me, can be answered in the words, organize, agitate. There ought to be such a united, determined appeal go up to Washington as will attract the attention of every member of Congress. Every city, village, and neighborhood in the Territory should organize, and every man and woman who is personally acquainted with a Congressman should write him a letter, describing existing conditions here. Every person who has a friend or relative back in the States who knows a Congressman should ask that friend or relative to appeal to such Congressman to lend his influence and his vote in support of this beneficent movement.

Congress is already being urged to establish public schools in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the far-away Philippines, and it will doubtless do it, for we all well know that no other agency can so thoroughly civilize, enlighten, transform, and Americanize those islands of the sea as the public school, and not until the American common school is thoroughly established there can order be restored or standing armies be dispensed with. If Congress is under obligation to provide free education in these far-away islands, whose civilization is foreign to ours, and who are not bound to us by any ties of race, history, tradition, or consanguinity, how much greater is its obligation to come to the relief of those in this Territory who are of our own blood, and who are entitled to every right, privilege, and prerogative of an American citizenship.

In the language of one of our old educational writers, "Let pride of military glory belong to foreign nations. Let the refined corruptions of the Old World attract the traveler to its splendid capitals. Let a ferid sun ripen for other countries the luxuries of a tropical clime, but let the schoolhouse and the church continue to be the boast of the American village. Let the American boy, whithersoever he may wander, leave that behind him which shall make him homesick for his native land. Let freedom and knowledge and morals and religion, as they are our birthright, continue to be the birthright of our children as long as time shall endure."

I, William H. Walker, secretary of the Indian Territory Public School Association, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by the association and the address delivered by Hon. John D. Benedict at the convention assembled at Purcell, Ind. T., the 2d day of December, A. D. 1899.

W. H. WALKER, Secretary.

Attest:

H. M. BUTLER,

President of Indian Territory
Public School Association.

GEORGE JENISON.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to present the following resolution and accompanying report and to ask for the immediate consideration of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BULL], chairman of the Committee on Accounts, presents the following privileged report and asks for its immediate consideration. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That George Jenison be continued as special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at the same salary of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund, from January 4, 1900, until otherwise provided for.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 9, directing that George Jenison be continued as special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at the same salary of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund, from January 4, 1900, until otherwise provided for, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Mr. Jenison has been employed as a special messenger in and about the House since the Fifty-second Congress, under authority of resolutions identical in terms with the one herewith reported. Such resolutions have authorized payment out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for. Payment out of the contingent fund ceased at the expiration of a session, and further provision for Mr. Jenison's employment and compensation was made either in the general deficiency bill or the legislative bill. The latter bill for the current fiscal year contains a provision which carried Mr. Jenison on the roll until the 4th day of January, 1900. The accompanying resolution continues his employment from that date. The resolution is reported favorably and its adoption recommended.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for a moment to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin to withhold the demand for the regular order for a moment. The gentleman from Ohio.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DANFORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Friday next, from 1 o'clock in the afternoon, be set apart for eulogies upon the late LORENZO DANFORD, a member of Congress from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that Friday next, commencing at 1 o'clock, be set apart for eulogies on the life and services of the late Mr. DANFORD, of Ohio. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman to ask for Friday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under the rules every Friday is specially dedicated to certain work reported by the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, and I submit that the gentleman ought to take some other day than Friday. We have plenty of days other than Friday, to the setting apart of which no one will make objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is nothing from that committee ready for action.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand there is. Some gentlemen on this side told me this morning that there was business from that committee which was ready. My colleague [Mr. SIMS], a member of that committee, sits in front of me, and he can state whether it is true or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will change my request, then, Mr. Speaker, and ask that Saturday be set apart.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio amends his request and asks that Saturday next, commencing at 1 o'clock, be set apart for eulogies on the life and character of the late Mr. DANFORD, of Ohio. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BAIRD.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I ask that Saturday, the 27th instant, commencing at 1 o'clock, be set apart for eulogies upon the Hon. SAMUEL T. BAIRD, late a Representative from Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] asks unanimous consent that Saturday, the 27th, commencing at 1 o'clock, be set apart for eulogies upon the late Mr. BAIRD, of Louisiana. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIGHTS OF ALIENS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 5297) to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend to aliens the same privileges concerning the acquisition, holding, owning, and disposition of real estate in the District of Columbia as by that act are conferred upon them in respect of real estate in the Territories of the United States.

Sec. 2. That all laws and parts of laws so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] who reported the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was brought to the attention of the House of Representatives by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. They were of the belief that two useful purposes would be served by the passage of this bill, one of which was to bring the present law in accordance with the spirit of the age and allow aliens to hold lands in the District of Columbia. The other was to save much valuable time in Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. I raise the point of order that we have no order.

Mr. JENKINS. Almost every week—

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks for order, so that members may understand what is being said.

Mr. JENKINS. Almost every week, Mr. Speaker, the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and in consequence thereof the attention of the House, is invited to the claims of parties seeking relief from the present law; and the Attorney-General of the United States informs us that there never has been a single enforcement of the law of escheat in the District of Columbia, but that Congress has always been willing to afford relief to every alien that has come here and asked for it.

The sole purpose of the bill is to place alien ownership in the District of Columbia on the same legal basis as it exists in the Territories of the United States. I have carefully examined and brought together the laws on the subject, and will ask unanimous consent to have them submitted as a part of my remarks at this time.

Mr. RAY of New York. Under this amendment to the Territorial laws will it permit any alien to purchase, own, and hold real estate in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JENKINS. I did not hear what the gentleman from New York said.

Mr. RAY of New York. Under the law as proposed to amend it will it permit any alien to hold, own real estate in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JENKINS. It will, under certain limitations.

Mr. RAY of New York. Without any conditions or limitations whatever?

Mr. JENKINS. Oh, no; there are some conditions imposed. It simply makes the law of the Territories applicable to the District of Columbia and places them all on the same footing.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, do you think that it is wise to extend the Territorial law to the District of Columbia?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, a question of order. The House is in such disorder that we can not hear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of members to the fact that disorder frequently arises from the fact that gentlemen conduct their debates in a conversational tone, and the House can not hear.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, with the permission—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to any gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. The point to which I was calling attention was simply this: I made inquiry whether or not this proposed amendment would permit any alien to purchase and own real estate in the District of Columbia, and the answer was in the affirmative. Then another inquiry was, were any limitations contained in the bill, and the gentleman answered that there were certain limitations; and then the inquiry was, whether he regarded it as wise to extend the Territorial law to the District of Columbia. I would like to have the gentleman point out, as briefly as he can, the limitations and restrictions, if there are any, upon this right different to those restrictions in the Territorial law?

Mr. JENKINS. It would take considerable time and require the production of the law of 1897. I could send and get it. This bill is practically in accordance with the legislation now of over forty States in the Union, and by an oversight, so we are informed, in the law of 1897, the District of Columbia was omitted. Now, then, the intention of this bill is simply to put aliens in the District of Columbia on the same footing with aliens in the Territories. It does not enlarge their rights in any single particular, but makes the laws of the Territories applicable to the District of Columbia.

Now, the bill has received the indorsement of the law department of the District of Columbia; the Commissioners prepared the bill and have recommended it. There can be no reason raised against it, because there is not a single instance where Congress has failed to relieve an alien where application has been made for relief, and it takes considerable time to do so. The Attorney-General of the United States has never enforced the rights of the United States.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman state whether he considers the situation analogous between the Territories and the District of Columbia?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not see any reason, I will say in answer to the gentleman, why a man can not own property in the District of Columbia just as well as he can in any State of the Union or in one of the Territories of the United States, without reference to citizenship.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that the law in the Territories never applied to any town lots in any of the cities or villages of the Territories. When we speak of the Territorial law, the intention of Congress in 1897 was to prevent large ownership.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But, as I understand it, this proposition was to permit an alien to own any class of property that he could acquire.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir; by purchase or inheritance.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will not this elaborate the old rule as it applies in the Territories?

Mr. JENKINS. Not at all; it simply applies the laws of the Territories to the District of Columbia.

By an act of Congress of 1801 the laws of the State of Virginia and of Maryland were continued in force in those parts, respectively, of the District of Columbia as had been ceded by each of those States to the General Government (act of February 27, 1801, section 1, 2 Statutes, 103, 104).

As by act of July 9, 1846 (9 Statutes, 35), President Polk, by proclamation of September 7, 1846, declared this act of full force as a result of the vote of the people of Alexandria County (9 Statutes, 1000). Congress retroceded to Virginia all of that portion of the District of Columbia which had been previously ceded to the United States; there are no State statutes in force in the District, as it now exists, except those of Maryland.

Among these is one which was passed by the legislature of Maryland in 1791, applicable to "the Territory of Columbia," materially modifying the common-law rule as to the acquisition of real estate by aliens (Maryland act of 1791, chapter 45, section 6; 2 Kilty, 821; 1 Dorsey, 272; cited in Dennis's Probate Law, D. C., 8, 9). The act of Congress of July 16, 1790 (1 Stat., 130), establishing the seat of the Government, it should be said, provided for the appointment of commissioners to locate it, and for the removal of the public offices thereto on the first Monday in December, 1800.

It is said that engraved plans of the city of Washington were distributed abroad, and for a time lots brought high prices in London, as foreigners seemed to have more confidence than the natives in the success of the experiment. (The City of Washington; Its Origin and Administration, by John Addison Porter, Johns Hopkins University Studies, third series, XI, XII.)

The liberal act of 1791 was evidently meant to encourage these foreign investors. It provided:

That any foreigner may, by deed or will hereafter to be made, take and hold lands within that part of the said territory which lies within this State in the same manner as if he was a citizen of this State, and the same lands may be conveyed by him and transmitted to and be inherited by his heirs or relations as if he and they were citizens of this State: Provided, That no foreigner shall, in virtue hereof, be entitled to any further or other privilege of a citizen.

Until a few years ago it could be said of the District of Columbia that it was the only English-speaking political community that had from the beginning allowed aliens freely to acquire, hold, convey, and transmit real estate.

Maryland, though not herself excepting aliens from the disabilities of the common-law rule in this respect until 1839, and then only resident aliens, for all aliens were not excepted until 1874 (Bernheim, History of the Law of Aliens, 173), assumed an attitude toward them, so far as this part of her territory was concerned, as liberal as that of Jefferson, who declared that he did not believe that the rights of men were dependent upon the geography of their birth.

COMMON-LAW DISABILITIES.

At common law aliens could acquire real estate by purchase—that is, by any method except by descent—but as to such property they had only a defeasible title; it was liable to forfeiture to the Crown.

Until a judicial proceeding known as inquest of office was, however, undertaken and their title thereunto found defective, they could hold against the world. But by their conveyances only a defeasible title passed to the purchaser, and they could not transmit by descent at all. Nor could aliens inherit real estate, for the law would not do such a vain thing as to cast upon them a title which the law itself would have to take away. (Bernheim, 125 et seq.: "Rights of aliens in England;" 11 Legal Observer, 192, and authorities cited.)

At common law personal property, which nowadays constitutes so large a part of the wealth of every civilized community, was for several reasons lightly regarded, and alien friends were freely permitted to acquire and hold this species of property. (1 Blackstone, 372; 8 Hume's Eng., 377 et seq.)

In modern times it must be confessed that if danger is to be apprehended from the ownership of our property by aliens it is in regard to the control of national funds and the stocks and bonds of corporations and not of land.

OPERATION OF THE MARYLAND STATUTE OF 1791.

The following cases relate to the ownership by aliens of land in the District of Columbia: Matthew vs. Rae (3 Cr. C. C., 690), Dixon vs. Walker (2 H. and H., 316), Walker vs. Potomac Ferry Co. (3 McA., 440), Dawson vs. Godfrey (4 Cr. (U. S.), 321), Orr vs. Hodgson (4 Wheat., 453), Spratt vs. Spratt (1 Pet., 343; 4 Pet., 393), Contee vs. Godfrey (1 Cr. C. C., 479), Jost vs. Jost (1 M., 487), Geofroy vs. Riggs (18 D. C., 33; reversed in 133 U. S., 250), and Pierce vs. Jacobs (18 D. C., 498).

At common law, as has been said, an alien could take land, except by descent or operation of law, and hold it until office found, for every one resident in England was presumed to be a natural-born subject owing an allegiance to the king until the contrary was judicially ascertained.

The hostility against the alien ownership of land is supposed by Blackstone to be due to the fear that the State might become subjected to foreign influences, but the real reason is traced by Bernheim to the policy of all early peoples, which recognizes citizens alone as having rights.

Under such a policy, strictly pursued, foreigners are enslaved and their property appropriated because they are not within the protection of the laws. The inhumane and discreditable operations of such a policy are visible in the attitude of England and these States, until a comparatively recent period, towards wrecks cast upon their shores.

This prejudice and hostility toward aliens naturally passed away with the growth of civilization. Maryland, in legislating for the Territory of Columbia, seems to have been the first State impressed with the importance of promoting trade and encouraging immigration by abolishing the antiquated rule of the common law. When Bernheim wrote his treatise on The History of the Law of Aliens in 1885, he was able to say that 33 of the States in this Union had in like manner brought their law in harmony with present conditions by permitting aliens to hold land (page 184).

No injury, inconvenience, or danger seems to have resulted from the Maryland act of 1791. So far as is known, there never was the slightest criticism of its provisions. In one respect it seems to have been subjected to a narrow construction.

The Supreme Court of the United States held (in Spratt vs. Spratt, 1 Pet., 343; 4 Pet., 393) that this act did not authorize the descent to alien heirs of land in the District which was acquired by the decedent after he had become a citizen of the United States.

This decision was favorable to the widow of the decedent, who, it may be said, should be permitted to inherit all of her husband's real estate when he dies without issue. There is a particularly strong reason for this favor to be shown all widows of aliens, whether they afterwards become citizens or not, because under the old statute of descents—which obtains in the District of Columbia—such widows might be left in partial if not total dependence upon the community, while the decedent's brothers or parents—aliens and nonresidents—might inherit the bulk of his realty.

RESTRICTIVE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1897.

Mr. Bernheim informs us that a few years before he wrote there had been considerable agitation and some discussion in Congress regarding the advisability of limiting the quantity of public land which nonresident aliens might hold.

As is well known, there was a disposition some years ago to prevent aliens, and especially foreign corporations, from acquiring large tracts of land in our Territories. On March 3, 1897 (24 Stat., 476), an act of Congress was approved which was meant, as its caption shows, "to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," etc. This act makes it—unlawful for any person or persons not citizens of the United States, or who have not lawfully declared their intention to become such citizens, or for any corporation not created by or under the laws of the United States, or of some State or Territory of the United States, to hereafter acquire, hold, or own real estate so hereafter acquired, or any interest therein, in any of the Territories of the United States or in the District of Columbia, except such as may be acquired by inheritance—

taining, not grants, but limitations, and therefore aliens can not now take by inheritance except from each other, as was held in Spratt vs. Spratt, supra. (See De Geofroy vs. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258, 273)— or in good faith in the ordinary course of justice in the collection of debts heretofore created: Provided, That the prohibition of this section shall not apply to cases in which the right to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties.

We have no such treaty with Great Britain. One is in process of negotiation.

to the citizens or subjects of foreign countries, etc.

Section 4 of the act declares—that all property acquired, held, or owned in violation—

Of its provisions—

shall be forfeited to the United States, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to enforce every such forfeiture by bill in equity or other proper process.

No such proceeding has ever been begun by him under this act.

This act went very much further than the mischief to be remedied required. We find that the next year it was so amended as to prevent it from applying to or operating in this District—so far as relates to the ownership of legations, or the ownership of residences by representatives of foreign governments or attachés thereof. (Act of March 9, 1888, 25 Stat., 45.)

But the most remarkable amendment occurred ten years after its passage, urged apparently by the citizens of the very Territories who, it would appear, had procured the restriction. This act of March 3, 1897 (29 Stat., 618), contains the same prohibition as is found in the act of 1887, and saves as it does the rights of those to whom they have been guaranteed by treaties.

But it goes much further and provides that the restrictions shall not apply to land owned by aliens in the Territories which was acquired on or before March 3, 1887, so long as it is held by such owners, heirs, or legal representatives. This was doubtless inserted out of abundant caution. The court of appeals of the District of Columbia held, in Johnson vs. Elkins (1 App. D. C., 430, 441), that the act of 1887 applied only to titles acquired after the passage of the act.

It not only allows aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States the right to acquire and hold lands in the Territories, but also those who shall become bona fide residents of the United States, adding that if any of these should cease to be such residents, they shall have ten years from such time in which to alienate their lands. Moreover, it is provided that the restrictions of the act shall not be construed to prevent aliens from acquiring or holding lots of lands in cities, towns, or villages of any of the Territories.

Not only does it allow aliens to acquire lands by inheritance and, in the ordinary course of justice, in the collection of debts, but also by lending money and securing the same upon real estate. In this last-mentioned case, it is true, lands acquired by aliens through the enforcement of liens given as security for money lent are required to be sold within ten years after title is vested in such aliens, or they shall escheat to the United States.

This liberal act of 1897 allows even those aliens who may hold land in any of the Territories in contravention of the provisions of the act to convey their titles at any time before the institution of escheat proceedings, though it takes care, of course, to prohibit mere colorable conveyances meant to evade the provisions of the act.

Perhaps the most important concession to aliens contained in the act, and certainly the one which reflects most credit upon our policy, is that contained in section 6, which allows the proceeds of the sale of an alien's land acquired unlawfully and condemned by the court to be sold to remain in the hands of the clerk for one year, subject to the order of the alien owner of such lands or his heirs or legal representatives.

In other words, the treasury of the Territory in which the lands may be situated does not obtain the benefit of such confiscation unless the alien or his heirs or legal representatives sleep on their rights for one year. Finally, the act allows the alien, while the escheat proceedings are pending, to show to the court that he has become a bona fide resident of the United States or has declared his intention to become a citizen thereof, whereupon the suit is dismissed. It is distinctly enacted that the previous act (of 1887) shall remain in force and unchanged so far as it refers to or affects real estate in the District of Columbia.

RECENT LEGISLATION IN ENGLAND AND THE STATES.

We have, then, disabilities imposed upon aliens in the District of Columbia, though not in the other Territories of the United States, which nearly all other communities have removed by statute.

The parliamentary committee in Great Britain which sat in 1868 and 1869 recommended:

That the present disabilities of alienage in respect of the holding and inheritance of land should be abolished altogether. (Part III of the Report on Nationality, Parliamentary Papers of 1868 and 1869, volume XXV, cited by Bernheim, pages 131 et seq.)

This report was adopted, and the statute of 33 and 34 Victoria, chapter 14, was enacted in 1870, which declares that—

Real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject, and a title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien in the same manner in all respects as through, from, or in succession to a natural-born British subject. (2 Am. and Eng. Encycl. Law, 2d ed., 80. See also 18 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 465.)

The common-law rules were adopted by all of these States except Louisiana, but they have been materially modified in nearly all of them. The American Encyclopedia of Law informs us that in many of them "resident aliens are placed on the same footing as natural-born citizens as to the right to acquire, hold, and transmit property, both real and personal," and in others "the same liberal policy has been pursued toward nonresident aliens." (2 Am. and Eng. Encycl. Law, 2d ed., 76.)

It has been found in Delaware and in New York, where the disabilities have been allowed to remain, that private acts relieving against them have come to be an invariable usage. (Bernheim, 169, 178.)

This, too, is the custom in the District of Columbia. An alien acquires real property in the District. The statute of 1887 is not self-executing, but makes it the duty of the Attorney-General to proceed against such property to enforce forfeiture. That officer usually has not the information upon which to proceed, and, it is likely, has no disposition to secure the confiscation. Yet until he takes such action "the title is not subject to attack by others." (Johnson vs. Elkins, 1 App. D. C., 430, 441.)

The alien owner wishes to convey and the title is found defeasible, or he dies and uncertainty as to the inheritance arises. At once upon request an enabling act is passed, such, for example, as that of March 18, 1897, "for the relief of the heirs of Pom K. Soh, deceased;" or that of April 4, 1896, which expressly relieves the real estate itself conveyed by an alien from the operations of the act of 1887, and exempts it from all forfeitures incurred under it. (39 Stat., 712.)

The time of Congress is thus unprofitably consumed, to the exclusion of much important business. The fact that relief against the act is always afforded individuals upon request is sufficient reason why the disabilities imposed upon them by it should be removed by a general statute such as adorns the legislative rolls of Great Britain, or that they should be materially lessened, as has been effected by our act of 1897 relating to the Territories.

As was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], when the law was passed in 1887 to prevent foreigners coming to this country and purchasing large tracts of land and holding them adverse to what might be called Americanism, it was there provided that that should not apply to city lots, showing it to be the intention of Congress that aliens might acquire city lots.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I see no especial objection to the ownership of property in Territories by aliens, but I can see how it would work great detriment in the District of Columbia if the door were to be left wide open and foreigners permitted to come in and buy property that we might desire afterwards for public purposes.

Mr. JENKINS. They can do it in your State.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; but that is not in the capital of the nation. Our State is vastly different from the District of Columbia, where the General Government exercises complete jurisdiction, over the territory and for the identical purpose of wholesome control. Foreigners owe no duty here and could not be made to defend this capital. Why should we give them rights in contravention of the common law?

Mr. JENKINS. After full consideration of this bill by the Commissioners of the District this morning and by the attorney of the District, the committee made this report, and we could not see the least objection, or the least particle of danger to this country, or to the capital of the nation, in allowing aliens to acquire property in the District of Columbia without limitation. As I have said, there has never been a single instance where Congress has refused relief.

Here is an instance that was called to our attention in the last Congress. A gentleman came here from Canada and brought his young son with him, and they both entered the Union army and served during the entire civil war. At the close of the civil war the old gentlemen returned to Canada and died. The young man made his home in the city of Washington, purchased a piece of property, which was very cheap at the time and subsequently became worth over $40,000 at a time when he wanted to sell it.

It was found that the title was defective from the fact that it had escheated to the Government because his father was an alien; that he was an alien and there was no proof whatever of the citizenship of either the young man or his father, and he had to lose the property or come to Congress to get the necessary relief. Upon the attention of Congress being called to it, it immediately passed a bill for his relief.

That is only one of the forty or fifty cases which have been called to the attention of the District Committee within the last two years.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask whether the report that he stated was a part of his remarks is too long to be read for the information of the House. I would like to know the exact reasons for this departure from the old rule. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. JENKINS. I have said nothing about any report. I said this morning I had gathered together the entire law on the subject, which is quite lengthy, and that I desired to submit that as a part of my remarks, showing the reason for making the change.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he gave notice of his intention to incorporate a report in his remarks.

Mr. JENKINS. The report refers to three several acts.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to any gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin in charge of the measure if he is prepared now to explain to the House what difference there is under the existing law between the District of Columbia and the Territory of Arizona or any other Territory—just what particular differences there are between the laws relating to the two?

Mr. JENKINS. I have sent for the act. I will ask that the act of 1897 be read from the Clerk's desk for the information of the House and particularly to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," etc., approved March 3, 1887, except so far as it affects real estate in the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall acquire title to or own any land in any of the Territories of the United States, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the prohibition of this section shall not apply to cases in which the right to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties to citizens or subjects of foreign countries, which rights, so far as they may exist by force of any such treaty, shall continue to exist so long as such treaties are in force, and no longer."

"Sec. 2. That this act shall not apply to land now owned in any of the Territories of the United States by aliens, which was acquired on or before March 3, 1887, so long as it is held by the then owners, their heirs or legal representatives, nor to any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States, and any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall have the right to acquire and hold lands in either of the Territories of the United States upon the same terms as citizens of the United States."

Provided, That if any such resident alien shall cease to be a bona fide resident of the United States, then such alien shall have ten years from the time he ceases to be such bona fide resident in which to alienate such lands. This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States.

"Sec. 3. That this act shall not prevent aliens from acquiring lands or any interests therein by inheritance or in the ordinary course of justice in the collection of debts, nor from acquiring liens on real estate or any interest therein, nor from lending money and securing the same upon real estate or any interest therein; nor from enforcing any such lien, nor from acquiring and holding title to such real estate, or any interest therein, upon which a lien may have heretofore or may hereafter be fixed, or upon which a loan of money may have been heretofore or hereafter made and secured: Provided, however, That all lands so acquired shall be sold within ten years after title shall be perfected in him under said sale or the same shall escheat to the United States and be forfeited as hereinafter provided."

"Sec. 4. That any alien who shall hereafter hold lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act may nevertheless convey his title thereto at any time before the institution of escheat proceedings as hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That if any such conveyance shall be made by such alien, either to an alien or to a citizen of the United States, in trust and for the purpose and with the intention of evading the provisions of this act, such conveyance shall be null and void, and any such lands so conveyed shall be forfeited and escheat to the United States."

"Sec. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, when he shall be informed or have reason to believe that land in any of the Territories of the United States are being held contrary to the provisions of this act, to institute or cause to be instituted suit in behalf of the United States in the district court of the Territory in the district where such land or a part thereof may be situated, praying for the escheat of the same on behalf of the United States to the United States."

Provided, That before any such suit is instituted the Attorney-General shall give or cause to be given ninety days' notice by registered letter of his intention to sue, or by personal notice directed to or delivered to the owner of said land, or to the person who last rendered the same for taxation, or his agent, and to all other persons having an interest in such lands of which he may have actual or constructive notice. In the event personal notice can not be obtained in some one of the modes above provided, then said notice shall be given by publication in some newspaper published in the county where the land is situate, and if no newspaper is published in said county then the said notice shall be published in some newspaper nearest said county.

"Sec. 6. That if it shall be determined upon the trial of any such escheat proceedings that the lands are held contrary to the provisions of this act, the court trying said cause shall render judgment condemning such lands, and shall order the same to be sold as under execution; and the proceeds of such sale, after deducting costs of such suit, shall be paid to the clerk of such court so rendering judgment, and said funds shall remain in the hands of such clerk for one year from the date of such payment, subject to the order of the alien owner of such lands, or his heirs or legal representatives; and if not claimed within the period of one year such clerk shall pay the same into the treasury of the Territory in which the lands may be situated, for the benefit of the available school fund of said Territory:

Provided, That the defendant in any such escheat proceedings may, at any time before final judgment, suggest and show to the court that he has conformed with the law, either becoming a bona fide resident of the United States, or by declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, or by the doing or happening of any other act which, under the provisions of this act would entitle him to hold or own real estate, which being admitted or proved, such suit shall be dismissed on payment of costs and a reasonable attorney fee to be fixed by the court.

Sec. 7. That this act shall not in any manner be construed to refer to the District of Columbia, nor to authorize aliens to acquire title from the United States to any of the public lands of the United States, or to in any manner affect or change the laws regulating the disposal of the public lands of the United States. And the act of which this act is an amendment shall remain in force and unchanged by this act so far as it refers to or affects real estate in the District of Columbia.

Sec. 8. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Approved, March 2, 1897.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The time for the discussion of this proposition appears to be under the control of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Wisconsin. Am I correct in that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin controls one hour of the time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask who controls the time in opposition to the measure?

The SPEAKER. After the gentleman from Wisconsin has exhausted his hour, if no other member of the committee rises in opposition, the gentleman from Michigan will be recognized.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the act of 1887 was practically declaratory of the common law upon this subject, with one or two exceptions, to which I desire to call attention. I have the act before me, but it takes so much time to read the lengthy statutes that I shall confine myself to a brief explanation of the law as it exists, and while I speak from memory I think I can give to the members of the House the exact condition of the law as it appears upon the statute books; and if in any respect I shall be incorrect, or my memory is at fault, I shall yield very gladly to any gentleman to make any statement of correction with reference to the matter.

The original act provided simply that aliens could not acquire title to real estate, as provided in the law, except by inheritance or in good faith in the ordinary course of justice for the recovery of debt.

Subsequently, in 1888, the statute was amended with a view to avoiding a violation of treaty stipulations with which it came in contact and to extend the rights of aliens to hold property here, such as the attachés of foreign legations and others who might in the course of their connection with such embassies acquire title to lands in the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to the act of 1897, which has been read and to which I desire to call your special attention. This act extended the privileges of the former act to the Territories of the United States, but excluded the District of Columbia. The remedial provision in this act of 1897 provided that parties might loan money, for instance, and secure themselves, notwithstanding that they were aliens, and could enforce their right in the courts and obtain title for property so purchased or acquired.

But while this remedial provision extended the provisions of the law to the various States of the Union the District of Columbia was omitted, so that no provision exists for the acquisition of title here under such circumstances.

This bill, therefore, that the committee now recommends simply extends the remedial rights or privilege to parties living in the District of Columbia, and is intended to relieve Congress of the labor of looking after these various individual cases which come up from time to time.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia in conference with the committee this morning—because of what they regard as the importance of the measure—stated the necessity of the enactment and cited the cases of parties living here who had no remedy at all at law, notwithstanding the fact that aliens were coming here and acquiring property; and they brought to the attention of the committee ten or fifteen cases where Congress had been asked to relieve individuals from disabilities which the committee do not believe the law was originally designed to exclude from their rights so far as our investigation has been able to go.

Now, again, for fear that in the noise and confusion some gentlemen had not heard the statement, I will say that this bill is drawn by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and that it has the approval of the two legal gentlemen connected with the District. They are all Americans, and they have recommended to Congress that aliens living in the District of Columbia be put on the same footing as aliens owning land in the several Territories of the United States.

The fact that at the time the act of 1887 was passed those owning city lots and village lots were exempted is a clear indication that the Congress of the United States did not intend to deprive aliens of all rights. And then, again, Congress on its own motion passed the law of 1897, so remedial in its nature.

Now I will yield such time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] as he requires.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to address the House particularly upon the merits of this bill, but I am moved to say what I am about to say by the kindness of my heart, in the fear that in the noise and confusion some of our Populist friends have not yet ascertained what is going on in the House.

Mr. RIDGELY. Perhaps that is true.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do this because I know that this subject is very dear, indeed, to them. Only a few years ago, Mr. Speaker, this question of the alien ownership of lands was made by our Populist friends one of the burning questions. Their platforms used to declaim against it. Their speeches were full of the perils to the Republic because of the ownership by foreigners of our broad acres. They used to publish long lists showing that Lord A owned so much, and Lord B owned so much, and the Earl of something else owned so much, showing that millions of acres, as they claimed, were now in the hands of the foreigner, the enemy of the Republic; that this alien ownership was a process constantly going on, and that in a little while it would result in turning the American out and installing the foreigner in his place as the owner of the lands of the United States.

I noticed that two or three years ago, when a modification of this law was sought looking to the possibility of these alien gentlemen in some of the Populistic territories being able to buy lands, although I then called their attention to the subject and to the great peril of it, not one of them had a word to say about it. Now I am afraid, from the silence thus far observed, that again they are going to forget what they have said in their platforms, what they have declaimed upon the stump, what they have led many people unfamiliar with the subject to believe was a great peril. In other words, I am afraid that they have on some occasions been using this bugaboo as a lever to hoist themselves into place, and that they are now forgetful of the means by which they arrived in place; that they are now forgetting the men whom they had wrought up to such a frenzy upon this subject.

I hope these gentlemen will not be silent when this outrage is being perpetrated upon the American citizen. I hope they will come to the front now with some of the vehemence which used to characterize them in the old campaigns of a very few years ago, and that they will not be forgetful of what they then said, now that there is a proposition to enlarge the power of the foreigner, not simply in the outlying Territories, not in remote districts, but right here in the very heart and capital of the Republic you are going to let the foreigner get a foothold.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. My attention was diverted at the moment, and I did not hear the reading of the bill. I judge, however, from the gentleman's remarks that it is a bill to permit the alien ownership of the soil in the District of Columbia. Am I to understand that the gentleman from Iowa is in favor of the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am simply here now as a friend of the Populist. [Laughter.] I am not advocating or opposing the bill. I say in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that I have been fearful that in the noise and confusion he has been taken advantage of, and that he did not know what was going on, and I took my place on the floor, simply because my tones may sometimes be somewhat stentorian, for the purpose of waking him out of the lethargy in which he seems to be at this particular moment. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Populist can tender his thanks after I am through. I desire to thank the gentleman from Iowa for having called my attention to the subject, because though by no means related to or affiliated with the Populists, I believe in the old common-law doctrine that forbids an alien to own the soil, and I shall try to defeat this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman is entirely welcome to any service I have rendered to him, although I am sure I am not entitled to his thanks, because I did not for one moment think that he was at all allied to those gentlemen whom I had called the Populists. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Now will the gentleman permit a word?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. I want also to thank the gentleman, and to call the attention of the House, and the Speaker especially, to the fact that we have twice called for order during the reading of this bill and its explanation by the gentleman in charge of it, and until this moment we did not know what was happening.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, having served the purpose for which I arose, and having awakened the gentleman, I will take my seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. We thank you.

Mr. JENKINS. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH].

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the inquiry which I propounded to the gentleman in charge of this bill related solely to the reason for this departure from the settled rule that has heretofore applied in the District of Columbia, and I was prompted to do so because I believed in my own mind that it was an uncalled-for innovation, that it had not been properly understood, and that it would bear further consideration and study before it was acted upon.

Personally, I believe that the land in the District of Columbia is more sacred than almost any land in any State or Territory. It is territory that the General Government exercises jurisdiction over and every citizen of the country has an interest in. Distinct limitations apply to it. For one I do not believe that the door should be opened wide and aliens permitted to come in here and purchase or own this property in the District of Columbia. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is to hinder a foreign syndicate or a corporation from coming in here and acquiring large tracts of valuable property and holding it, and holding it, indeed, against the best interests of the District of Columbia and possibly of the General Government?

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this departure would be wise. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that Congress never has failed to pass remedial legislation in matters of this kind, where estates have been acquired by aliens and title was sought to be perfected. I am perfectly willing to do that where the circumstances warrant it. A special bill introduced for the purpose of quieting any title or fixing a definite and distinct title in a person who acquires that property is, I think, a fit subject for Congressional consideration; but I do not believe it is wise at this time, or prudent, nor do I believe that the circumstances warrant us in opening the door so wide to alien ownership of District property, as is done in this bill.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask my friend from Michigan this question. At present an alien may acquire title to a town lot in Guthrie, Prescott, or Santa Fe?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; by virtue of a special law of Congress.

Mr. LACEY (continuing). Or in any State or Territory?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; in many of the States.

Mr. LACEY. But the States regulate that themselves?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; Congress is not concerned.

Mr. LACEY. But, so far as the Territories are concerned, I would ask what is there so sacred about a town lot on Thirty-fifth street in the District of Columbia that would distinguish it from a town lot in Santa Fe or Guthrie?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. My answer to the gentleman is—

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, let us have order.

The SPEAKER. The House is in good order, but the Chair will ask for a little better order.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Iowa asks what there is so sacred in the ownership of a town lot in this District of Columbia that should distinguish it from one in Arizona. My answer to that is this: That we have a Territory here fixed and limited, over which the United States exercises jurisdiction and authority, and we only pretend to exercise that jurisdiction over the Territory of Arizona or New Mexico temporarily.

Arizona may soon pass into the Union as a State. Who knows? It is in the province of this Congress to so decree whenever it pleases; and when it does pass, the supervision and control and direction of the State of Arizona will then apply to all of that land; but never in the history of the Republic will the Government of the United States qualify in the slightest degree the authority which it exercises at present over the District of Columbia. This is one spot in which the United States of America will always exercise supreme authority, and I hope it will make this city the pride of every citizen and the most attractive city in the world.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my friend another question. May not a foreigner acquire title to a town lot in the capital of Michigan?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; by the courtesy of legislative enactment.

Mr. LACEY. What is there so different about the capital of Michigan and the capital of the United States to make it safe for a foreigner to acquire title to a town lot in the capital of Michigan and yet be necessary to keep him out of the city of Washington?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. A foreigner, an alien, may acquire a town lot in the city of Lansing, but the government of the State of Michigan does not pretend to exercise jurisdiction or control over the town lots of the city of Lansing or extend unusual privileges to owners, as the General Government does here. If our State acquires any title, it must purchase it in the usual way; but here, in the District of Columbia, there is a territory of 60 square miles, as I believe, that is devoted to the purposes of the General Government, and everything is subservient thereto; and, Mr. Speaker, I would preserve the situation as it is, subservient to the wishes of the General Government, and not by any wholesale legislation of this character invite foreigners to come in here and take up desirable property and hold it, when they owe no allegiance to our country, pay no attention to our Government, and have no interest therein save to profit by our enterprise. Therefore I am opposed, utterly and completely, to this radical departure from the present principles that apply to the District of Columbia, and I hope the bill may be defeated.

Mr. BABCOCK. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I can offer a suggestion that will obviate the objections of not only the gentleman from Michigan but also the gentleman from Texas. The object in introducing this bill and bringing it to the attention of Congress is to relieve the aliens in the District who are now owning property that they can neither dispose of, utilize, improve, nor mortgage. Since I have been connected with the District Committee we have passed somewhere in the neighborhood of fifty bills through this House for the relief of individual cases. In no instance has there ever been an objection. The committee now has a number of bills before it, and on the first bill the Commissioners have made this report and submitted a draft of this bill to cover all such cases, which the committee thought a good one. That is the object of it.

Now, to do away with the objection of the gentleman from Michigan, I will offer this amendment. The amendment is simply to relieve those that own real estate in the District and gives them no right to acquire real estate in the future. I will send the bill to the desk and ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will you not have the bill read as it will be with the amendment in?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the bill be read, and in connection therewith an amendment which he offers thereto. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend to aliens now owning real estate in the District of Columbia the same rights and privileges concerning the acquisition, holding, owning, and disposition of real estate in the District of Columbia as by that act are conferred upon them in respect of real estate in the Territories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

With the following amendment:

In line 7, after the word "aliens," insert the words "now owning real estate in the District of Columbia."

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman. In the first place, it seems to me that no alien could be owning real estate in the District of Columbia, except under some special dispensation of Congress.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the abstracts of title from the title insurance companies and other instruments will show that aliens do own this real estate, but it is contrary to law.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Then the plain duty of the officers is to file proceedings of escheat. This bill would simply deprive the law officers of the Government of the power and the authority to enforce the law against men who are daily violating the law, and these men owe no allegiance to the Government of the United States.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not understand that there is any case in this city where there is any question about it. There is no question as to these parties having paid for, or given a consideration for, the real estate they are supposed to own.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. That is a matter between individuals, but the right of an alien to own and sell property is of much more importance.

Mr. BABCOCK. This bill, with my amendment, will not extend to aliens the right to acquire property in the future, but gives the right to those now holding it to dispose of it. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that unless we pass some measure of this kind, we are going to be confronted by more than fifty individual bills, not one of which will there be any objection to. They will consume the time of the committee and the time of the House, and this bill simply disposes of them in a bunch.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. If the gentleman will prepare a bill that will authorize these aliens to dispose of the property which they hold in violation of law, I will support it.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is what this bill does.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Your bill does not so state.

Mr. OLMSTED. You leave the word "acquisition" in.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS rose.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in the report which accompanies this bill the committee used the following language:

The act of 1887 forfeits to the United States all property held or owned in violation of its provisions, while the act of 1897 allows aliens to dispose of their real estate before the institution of escheat proceedings, and even after sale under such proceedings the proceeds are subject to the order of the alien owner for a period of one year.

Now, therefore, it follows if the object of this bill be to allow aliens to dispose of their real estate in the District of Columbia, the bill is absolutely useless, because they already have the right under the act of 1897.

Mr. BABCOCK. That law does not apply to the District of Columbia, but only to the Territories.

Mr. JENKINS. This bill undertakes to apply the Territorial law to this District. That is all this bill seeks to do.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter can be settled without difficulty.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is not true that, under its provisions, aliens now owning real estate in the city of Washington may increase their ownership by additional purchases?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not if the amendment which I have offered be adopted. This simply confirms the right of those who now own real estate, but does not give them the privilege of further acquiring property in the District.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. But does not the amendment, by its very terms, give the same right to own and acquire property in the District?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think, if the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that a careful reading of his amendment will show that it not only confirms the title in these aliens as a separate and distinct class, but will enable them to purchase property hereafter and acquire title to it. Now, if the gentleman will change the language of his amendment, and give simply the power to sell and dispose of property, there would be no trouble whatever about it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well, I will meet the wishes of gentlemen in that regard by asking to have the word "acquisition," in line 7, stricken out of the bill—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that one or two members have asked to be heard in opposition to the pending bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin yielded a part of his time; but gentlemen who are not members of the committee have indicated a desire to be heard. The Chair is disposed to give all members a fair opportunity of discussing the matter, and if no member of the committee desires to be heard at this time, will recognize some one outside of the committee to occupy the floor under the rule.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think we can save time if the gentleman from Wisconsin simply desires to adopt the measure before the House to secure to the present owners of property the right to dispose of the same.

Speaking for myself, and I do not doubt that I speak for other gentlemen on this side of the House, we are perfectly willing to facilitate such a proceeding as that. But it seems to me that the only way to accomplish that purpose, in so far as the pending bill is concerned, is to make such an amendment to it as will make clear and definite the object sought to be accomplished—that is to say, that it shall contain a provision concerning the disposition of the real estate now held by these parties, and not a provision allowing them to acquire additional real estate. There is a provision to sell, and authority to receive the proceeds. That is no more than fair and just. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. JENKINS. This bill does not change the ordinary rule which prevails in reference to the acquisition of property in the District or in the Territories.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. All that I am concerned in, Mr. Speaker, is as to whether we shall provide some method by which these people may dispose of this property which they have in some way acquired.

Mr. JENKINS. This bill, I will state to the gentleman from Texas, does not change the former law in that regard.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. If by consent we can lay it aside for a little time, and let us have an opportunity of examining more carefully the act of 1897, which has been cited, it might be possible to save a good deal of time in the consideration of the matter.

Mr. JENKINS. I have no possible objection to that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be laid aside temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of enabling members to examine the law bearing upon the subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

TAX DEPARTMENTS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5042.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 5042) to provide for improvements in the tax departments of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put I wish to say that this is a bill making an appropriation, and that it was not properly referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The proper committee for this bill was the Committee on Appropriations. The two rules covering the matter are very explicit, and provide that the District Committee shall have charge of all matters relating to District affairs except bills carrying appropriations. Appropriations relating to the District should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, it may be this is a measure that ought to be adopted. I am not going to say as to that, because the subject has never been before the Committee on Appropriations. It was not submitted to the committee at the last session. Many matters have been submitted, and have come over from session to session, but this was never submitted to the Committee on Appropriations and they have never investigated it.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the bill, in the first place, authorizes the institution of the card system; but that is unnecessary. The power inheres in the Commissioners, by virtue of the organic act, to institute the system, and all they really want is the money.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say to the gentleman from Vermont that after a conference with the Commissioners this morning, and the executive officers of the taxing department having charge of this matter, I feel certain that legislation is necessary to enable them to make this change, and the only justification which the committee has for dealing with this small appropriation is the fact that the amount is within the annual appropriation and does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, on that point we can in no better way learn whether it is necessary than by referring to a parallel instance in one of the Departments of the Government. The card system was instituted in the War Department. General Ainsworth, the head of the Record and Pension Division of the War Department, came to the committee asking for an appropriation for additional clerks to institute that system, as he said, and clerks were given him for that purpose, but not a word was said about the card system. The authority to institute the system existed in the Department as a function of administration, and it so exists in the Commissioners in this case. It is not a matter requiring legislation at all. The proposition, it seems to me, is wholly unnecessary. If, however, gentlemen of the District Committee do not take this view and feel that the Committee on Appropriations have not the authority to deal with it without authority from Congress, why then they can strike out the appropriation and pass the bill, and have the appropriation to be made by the Committee on Appropriations, as the rules provide; but I assure the Speaker that the Committee on Appropriations are not in doubt as to their authority to deal with the subject, and if they were satisfied upon investigation that this appropriation should be made, they would undoubtedly allow it.

I will say further that I do not rise to put myself in the attitude of opposing this bill. I simply call the attention of the House to the fact that this is a matter which should go to the Committee on Appropriations, and to suggest what will appear to everyone as proper in the premises; and that is that appropriations should be carried together and not scattered helter-skelter through bills which provide legislation. The Committee on Appropriations could deal with it in the regular order. If there is occasion for haste, let it be offered as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill, which is reported this morning and will be before the House to-morrow. It will be germane to that bill. There are provisions for the District of Columbia in the urgent deficiency bill, and if there is special urgency for this it might properly go into that bill.

If gentlemen do not see fit to take this course, I am not going to array myself against the passage of this bill. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the fact. I will not raise the point of order under the rule. If any other gentleman sees fit to do so, he can; but I only want to call the attention of those having charge of the matter to the fact that if this practice is continued we shall have to invoke the rule in the future.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Vermont, as the Chair understands, is that this committee—the Committee on the District of Columbia—

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not understand that the gentleman from Vermont makes the point of order.

The SPEAKER (continuing). Has no jurisdiction over this bill because it contains an appropriation. It has been said by Speaker Crisp, Speaker Reed, and others that an erroneous reference of a public bill, remaining uncorrected, in effect gives jurisdiction to the committee. The House has had its day in court to have the erroneous reference corrected and has failed to do so. The Chair is of the opinion, therefore, that this matter is properly within the control of this committee, and that it is within the power of the House, in considering the bill, to determine whether to leave the appropriation in the bill or to strike the appropriation out of the bill and leave only the matters of general legislation.

Mr. GROUT. If the Chair will permit me. I did not wish to be understood as raising the point of order. The Speaker was actively engaged in examining the authorities when I stated that I would not raise the point of order. I simply made a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the remarks of the gentleman upon the point of order, and therefore the remarks of the Chair would not apply. The question is: Shall the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill?

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 5042. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5042) to provide for improvements in the tax departments of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to enlarge the rooms now occupied by the assessor and collector of taxes of the District of Columbia and to rearrange the space so as to better accommodate the public who have occasion to transact business with those offices, and to provide fixtures and pay other necessary expenses incident thereto, and to put in operation the card system for the improvement of the business methods of those offices, including the temporary hire of clerks, the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, is hereby appropriated, one-half out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, as shown in the title, the bill is one to improve the condition of things in the tax department of the District of Columbia. The Commissioners, being advised that some change in the methods of doing business and some enlargement of the rooms down there are necessary, appointed a committee of four experts that have had long experience in the tax department of the District of Columbia, and directed them to make a close examination of the rooms and the condition of things, and the methods of doing business, and also as to the amount required to make the necessary change in order to facilitate the doing of business in that department.

The committee spent some time in making a very careful examination of the matters intrusted to them and went to several cities for the purpose of getting information in regard to the subject; and they found the most satisfactory plan in the city of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island; but they also visited the city of Boston and some other large cities, where a large amount of business of this kind was done, for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Commissioners of the District the very best method of doing business here.

Now, they have reported back to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners themselves took the subject up, and then the matter was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee also gave a hearing to the taxing officers here in the District, and also made a personal inspection of the methods and of the rooms where the change is contemplated, and the committee are unanimous, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the passage of this bill and a change in the system of doing business, and of making the appropriation of $4,000.

Now, it was not the intention of the committee to trench upon the rights of the Committee on Appropriations; but because of the fact that the legislation embraced in this bill properly belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia and it was for that committee to say whether or not this bill should be favorably recommended to the House, they also included this question of appropriations, because the amount is within the annual appropriation for that department. Now, we are satisfied, from a careful inspection, as I have said, that it will not increase the cost or will not increase the expenses of the District a single dollar, but that in a year or two it will cheapen the cost of the collection of taxes in the District of Columbia.

Now, every three years there has been appropriated—and everything indicates that the appropriation will have to be continued—the sum of $3,000 for the purpose of preparing what is called the numerical book of the District of Columbia, which contains the names of all the owners of all the property here so far as it is possible to obtain that information, giving a description of the land, the value of the property, the value of the improvements, and a great many other things which are required by the law. The District Commissioners did not feel authorized to go on and complete that without the direction of Congress; and in fact the committee are of the opinion that under the law they can not go any further than they have done in the way of changing the methods. They have spent $1,500 in the purchase of cards for the purpose of introducing the card system here in the way of doing business.

Now, as the matter stands, it is very inconvenient to the owners of property here. It is almost impossible, under the present method, for parties to know whether they have paid their taxes or not. By the introduction of the card system it brings to the attention of the Commissioners every day the daily changes of ownership of property, and in a few minutes they can look up the ownership of any piece of property, and it enables them at a glance to know who is the owner, its value, and the amount of taxes, etc.

It is conceded by all gentlemen who have given this matter attention that the system of cards should be introduced, and that expense will be saved in the purchase of cards instead of the publication of books. That book is required by the law, and it is impossible to change it; and after that book is made out there is no way of ascertaining if there has been or there is any subdivision of the property, and the Commissioners have no way of keeping track of that except by putting out an annual. As will be understood, it is like an annual book instead of a codification, and it takes much time whenever it is necessary to look through the various books in order to give the taxpayer the information he requires.

At present, if a party goes down to the District building for the purpose of paying his taxes, the officers and clerks have to spend the time to examine some fourteen different volumes in order that they may know that the party has all the property described in the receipt. Now, all that they would have to do under the new system would be to pull out a card which tells at a glance the information required.

Now, the gentlemen down there have stated to us this morning, what they stated in the committee the other day, that there have been times within the last year when at least 5,000 people have been kept waiting trying to pay their taxes, and that two or three times over 500 people were required to remain out of doors at a stormy time, the rooms being insufficient to permit them to do the business.

Now, they simply propose, by making a few changes at an expenditure of $1,500, to put in two or three additional places to accommodate the taxpayers and to allow two lines of people to come in and go out at once without any confusion, while at present only one line can come in, and they have to jam against one another in endeavoring to get out. In other words, there will be one way for the taxpayer to get in and another for him to get out, and thus prevent confusion.

The appropriation of $4,000 includes the employment of a few temporary clerks for the purpose of making the change, but as soon as that is done no permanent clerks will be required. The committee are assured from this examination that in less than one year the annual appropriation for this branch of business will be decreased at least one-fourth, if not one-third. Now, if there is any gentleman who desires any question answered, I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentlemen state his amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. JENKINS. I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of offering the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. But I desire to offer some remarks in connection therewith.

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire in connection with the proposed legislation, fully recognizing the usefulness as well as the convenience of this proposed change, to emphasize to the House the necessity of what might be called a fair, orderly procedure in the business of the House. It is the function of the Committee on the District of Columbia to submit on the day assigned such legislation as they determine or consider will be for good administration in the District. I have no doubt this proposition is in favor of good administration. But I hold and claim that this very line of work can be done under the power that to-day rests with the District Commissioners through official administration. Further than that, should it be necessary, then the legislation is proper; but the right to appropriate on legislation does not belong to the Committee on the District of Columbia, but is a part of the appropriation bill that comes from the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, it is proposed by the Commissioners to inaugurate what is called the card system. General Ainsworth, of the War Department, introduced the card system that runs to every volunteer in the war of the rebellion, nearly three millions, covering claims of soldiers, as well as widows and orphans, by the simple addition in the general appropriation, the legislative bill—by an increased appropriation for stationery, as well as for such necessary clerks for that work. It is simply administrative, and therefore I think in the interest of orderly appropriation. The Committee on the District of Columbia should come into this House and recommend legislation for the District, and after that the Appropriation Committee should take up the legislation made statute by Congress and appropriate in the proper bill. I move to strike out the appropriation. In making the motion, Mr. Chairman, I submit to the committee in charge of the bill that I do not believe the legislation proposed is necessary, because I am of opinion the organic authority of the District will allow this; it is simply a change in the method of administration.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have a very high regard for the opinion of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, and I am exceedingly sorry that in the present instance I can not agree with him.

The Committee on the District of Columbia is confronted with many propositions which must be taken into consideration where new law is to be enacted, and where it becomes absolutely essential in order to carry such law into effect to couple with the law an appropriation for that purpose.

Now, in reply to the argument just made by the gentleman, I would say that the circumstances surrounding the present case are of a peculiar character. I would say further to the gentleman that if we were to adopt his suggestion and try to bring in this proposition as an amendment on an appropriation bill, it would be subject to the point of order.

In the very nature of the case this proposition requires an appropriation. It has been suggested, however, by various gentlemen that we pass the bill without the appropriation. But what would be the effect? It would be an absolute waste of time. The action would be useless. The legislation would have no effect. Gentlemen say that we can put it in the general deficiency bill and move it as an amendment, at the proper time, to cover the expenditure which the bill itself proposes. But I must beg to take issue with gentlemen on that point. There are difficulties in the way although they tell us that it will "make us feel better."

Now, I do not know the particular provision in the urgency deficiency bill where this subject would properly be included. I can not undertake to suggest where it should be embodied in that bill; and therefore I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] will not prevail. I will state frankly to the gentleman that it would be a great deal better to defeat the bill entirely, because if this amendment is adopted it would make it simply a farce and would not accomplish the purpose intended. I ask a vote on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin says it will be "a farce" if the appropriation is stricken out of the bill or if it is passed with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I wish to say to him and to the House that it will simply confine the Committee on the District of Columbia to what the rule gives them—that is, to legislate for the District—and leave to the Committee on Appropriations the work assigned to that committee by the rule, namely, that of making appropriations for the expenses of the District under the law. That is all that the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania seeks to accomplish. If it makes a farce of the proceedings, then the rules of the House are farcical, and we have no safe guide on which to predicate our action.

Mr. BABCOCK. Of course the gentleman from Vermont understands that if the appropriations for the District of Columbia are not sufficient or not specific for such a purpose there is no power in the Commissioners—

Mr. GROUT. But they are specific.

Mr. BABCOCK (continuing). And no appropriation can be expended by the Commissioners of the District excepting for a specific purpose which is authorized by Congress.

Mr. GROUT. Undoubtedly, but a sum of money is appropriated for clerical assistance, we will say, and is placed under the control of the District Commissioners.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is true, but unless provision is made in the law for an office to which the appropriation might apply the Commissioners would have no right to use the money for that purpose.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly not. The law is specific in that regard; but this is the question—and I have some delicacy in suggesting it, because I happen to be on the subcommittee in charge of District appropriations—whether the Committee on the District of Columbia shall be allowed to usurp the functions of the Committee on Appropriations and make appropriations in this desultory way; whether, in short, it is not better to have these appropriations brought before the House in one budget in accordance with the rules. If the gentleman thinks that there is not authority to appropriate this money, very well. Let him pass his bill and give the committee authority. That is within his proper province. His committee proposes legislation and the Committee on Appropriations appropriate the money. But for the sake of decency and good order in the business of the House, and for the sake of the observance of the rules of the House, let him drop out the appropriation and let the Committee on Appropriations deal with that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, if this is a violation of the rules, I want to withdraw the bill. I do not want to present anything to this House that is a violation of the rules. The Speaker has ruled that it is not.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, no.

Mr. BABCOCK. And he stated that Speaker Crisp and Speaker Reed and others have held the same way.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman can have all the time he desires when I get through.

Now, I want to say another word, not only to the gentleman from Vermont, but to the House. I have endeavored to cull out from the bills referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia everything that other committees in this House have proper jurisdiction of, and have cautioned the clerk of our committee and the chairmen of the subcommittees to take up no matter that we could possibly turn over to any other committee.

Time and time again I have sent bills to the Appropriations Committee, as the gentleman from Vermont well knows. But this has been the practice of the House as long as it has considered District matters. This is a class of legislation which, if you pass at all, you must necessarily couple with an appropriation. Why, with the bills opening streets we have had to carry special appropriations to pay for the surveys and the general expense of the reports on those streets—not to pay for the property, because that is left with the Appropriations Committee. But if we pass a bill to open a street without making an appropriation for this incidental expense, we might just as well pass no bill at all. This is a measure of the same kind, and I am entirely satisfied to have the committee decide the matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is permanent establishment, to go on forever.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the House decides that the Committee on the District of Columbia has no authority under the rules to do this, I shall be satisfied. I claim that our committee have jurisdiction of the matter. I intend that the District appropriation bills proper and the continuing appropriations are the legislation which go to the Committee on Appropriations under the rules, not special things or new legislation. I claim that the committee are right in presenting this report, and that it is properly here under the rules. If you want to strike out the appropriation, gentlemen, strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, one word. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that the Speaker held that this is not in violation of the rule. He held no such thing. He merely held that because the point of order was not raised before the bill was considered and reported to the House, that then it was too late to make the point of order; that the reference was improper. That would be the rule as to a public bill, though not as to a private bill. This being a public bill, that would apply. In fact, however, I made no point of order, but merely stated in a general way the objection to this procedure, and made a suggestion as to the way by which this bill could be disposed of in an orderly manner, namely, by letting it go into the urgent deficiency bill.

Now, one thing more with reference to what the gentleman from Wisconsin says. He says they have referred certain bills to other committees. Yes; they have. They have sent down to the Committee on Appropriations a bill which in every section and sentence provides legislation and says not a word about an appropriation, with which that committee has no power whatever to deal. That is a bill which we shall bring back into the House on the first opportunity and ask to have re-referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is a bill regulating the hours of policemen's work, which is totally outside the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. It is sent to us by the District Committee on the ground that it involves an appropriation. Yes, if the bill were to become a law it would reduce the hours of policemen's work, and that would make necessary a larger number of policemen, and would of course require a larger appropriation.

So by that sort of reasoning they refuse to take jurisdiction of that bill and send it to the Committee on Appropriations, who can not deal with it; but they do take jurisdiction of this bill, with which they have no business whatever under the rule. Had the rule been invoked in season, the reference would have been canceled and the bill would have been sent to the Committee on Appropriations, for anything that the Speaker said, and the rules are explicit. The Speaker only held that the rule not having been taken advantage of in season, it was too late now to make the objection. That was the scope of his holding; but really no point of order had been made.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Vermont, that the passage of the police bill will require a large appropriation, which will be continuous, and it is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, and has been for years, to appropriate for the pay of policemen. If our committee should consent to handle that, and increasing the force, the legislation would be ineffective without an appropriation; it would be beyond our jurisdiction to provide for that.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Committee on Appropriations can not fix the hours of policemen's labor.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Committee on Appropriations not only do such things as that, but they fix the price of commodities, and other things of that sort.

Mr. BINGHAM. But not the hours of labor, though.

Mr. BABCOCK. And I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], that I have yet to see any large appropriation bill pass this House that did not contain legislation on many subjects.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, the action of the Committee on the District of Columbia in referring what is called the police bill to the Committee on Appropriations shows how very careful that committee is with reference to assuming undue jurisdiction. In the last Congress the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia was called by the Speaker to the fact that that bill was improperly referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and on the suggestion of the Speaker it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, where the Speaker said it properly belonged.

Now, the Committee on the District of Columbia do not believe that they have fallen into any error so far as that is concerned; but it only shows, as I say, that there is no intention on the part of the Committee on the District of Columbia to assume powers that they do not properly enjoy under the rule. But that question is past so far as this bill is concerned. The gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations had ample time to make the point of order if he had so desired. The gentleman very courteously said it was not the intention of that committee or his personal intention to make that point of order. But, as I understand, he was perfectly willing to leave it to the House, just as the rule of the House had, in fact, left it with the House.

Now, we are not very busy to-day. To-morrow we may be busy when that part of the urgent deficiency bill, or the proper bill, is reached, where they say we can indicate this as an amendment. It may not be possible for us to find out just when it would be reached. We may not be here; and, certainly, whether or not, and whether we had all the information necessary, it is clear that it would be subject to the point of order, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Vermont would be here to make that point of order, and the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia would have to acquiesce in it.

But the question is, If the House is competent to determine to-morrow, why not take time and determine it to-day? This committee has not to pass on any question of jurisdiction between the District of Columbia and the Committee on Appropriations. The only question is whether Congress will permit the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make this necessary change, and whether the House in its wisdom and judgment sees fit to say that the sum of $4,000 shall be appropriated; and it does not reflect on that great committee—the Committee on Appropriations—and it does not affect their rights; and the taking up this morning of this bill by the committee does not indicate that there can be any attempt on the part of the Committee on the District of Columbia or on the part of the House to take away any just powers of the Committee on Appropriations under the rule.

It is simply a question as to whether or not this bill should pass; or, perhaps, first, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall prevail. As was well said by the chairman of this committee, the Committee on the District of Columbia would prefer that this bill should be beaten rather than that amendment should pass, because then we shall have perfected the legislation, and by withholding the appropriation they can not do anything at all until the Committee on Appropriations shall have made the necessary appropriation. Now, there is no reason why this should be divided now, so long as the bill is properly before the House and we have not invaded the jurisdiction of the committee.

If this were trenching upon the rights of the Committee on Appropriations, there would be great force in what has been said by the gentleman from Vermont and the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but there is absolutely no force in anything that the gentlemen have said, so far as that is concerned, because both concede the necessity for and the wisdom of the improvement, and both say the District Commissioners have ample power to make the change without any legislation; but they are compelled to withhold because of the want of the necessary appropriation.

But when the Commissioners feel that they have not got the power, and certainly, even if they had it, it ought to be done by the direct action of Congress, rather than the action of the Commissioners, so that the rules may not be changed when the change is a very radical one, a very important one, involving the title of all property here in the District of Columbia. In a matter of so much importance certainly it ought to be passed upon by the House, especially when the House is perfectly willing to do it.

Now, we have not got the guaranty of these very generous gentlemen that this appropriation will be made. They simply invite us to let go to-day, with the inducement that we may go on to some appropriation bill in the future. Now, if it was going to be taken up in a day or two, it would not make any difference. Perhaps a day or two would not make any difference, but certainly when we have got the cards and got the clerks ready to do the work, we may just as well be doing this work, if it is going to be done at all. The fact of the appropriation or the provision for the appropriation is not the important fact, because if the bill does not contain the appropriation the change will never be made.

The Commissioners, as I said just now, have gone as far as they thought they ought to under the law, and have already expended $1,500 of the public money in making this change, and can not go any further. They certainly can not make the change in the room down there without the appropriation, and it ought not to be withheld. I think the House is competent to pass upon the question, and is fully advised as to whether or not they will permit the change, and that is the only question we are interested in this morning; and if this committee is of the opinion that this appropriation shall be stricken out of the bill, I want to join with you in defeating the bill and let the responsibility rest with the Committee on Appropriations.

But I feel for my own part that the House is willing to take up this matter and competent to take it up without violating any rule, and that it ought to be taken up this morning and disposed of when the question is fresh in the minds of every gentleman who has listened to the debate, and not be deferred until it has gone out of our minds and when only one or two gentlemen will recollect anything about it.

The amount asked for is $4,000. The annual appropriation is $3,000, and, as we have stated this morning, after a careful examination we are satisfied that over $1,000 a year will be saved to the Government by making this change. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am confident that in the consideration of this matter there is a slight misunderstanding. I want to assure the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee that their sensibilities were not overlooked even in our committee in the consideration of this bill. The matter was considered, and all the delicacy that could have been felt we also felt for them; but the bill being a necessity, an urgent one, I desire to say to the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee that the bill interests every land owner and every taxpayer in the District of Columbia. It is not only for the purpose of saving money to the Government that we urge the passage of this bill, but we urge it for the reason of justice to the taxpayer.

On every occasion when there is an accounting for the payment of taxes there is a liability to mistakes. These mistakes have been onerous on the people. We ask this as an absolute necessity, in all fairness, to the taxpayers of the District. It was suggested that some member of our committee should call on the Appropriation Committee, from the very fear that this bill might be delayed; but after being assured that precedents were plenty with reference to certain matters, that there could be no reason why any member of that committee should complain, the bill was unanimously recommended.

The very argument the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes, the very citations he makes of the work of General Ainsworth, are the best argument on that for this bill, for it proposes to do for the taxpayers what General Ainsworth has done for the soldier and pensioner. Now, after the time we have occupied, after assuring the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee that their matter was carefully considered, the delicacy of the matter was considered, and that there was no intention on the part of this committee to assault the rights of their committee, it seems to me, in justice, and in honor and fairness, that with that assurance they should not interpose these technical objections.

I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] will consider it in that light and give us their support in the passage of this bill. I am opposed to killing this bill, Mr. Chairman; I am opposed to the delay of the bill. While I do not join my colleagues of the committee in the desire to urge the killing of the bill, I join in the desire to pass the bill, with the assurance that there was no intention, even if it could be so construed, to take from the Committee on Appropriations a single right that it possesses.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As to the usefulness of this measure proposed, I have no doubt it has been fully digested by the Commissioners and examined carefully by the committee having the bill in charge at this time. That it has been successfully administered and expedites work Mr. Ainsworth's records clearly prove. Nor am I a special stickler or extremist for the rights under the rules of the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it have the same limit and privileges under the rules that we are willing to accord to every other committee, and especially the committee that has a multitude of questions coming before them, as has the committee before us to-day in the matters relating to this District.

I claim, sir, that this is nothing but a matter of administration under a system of bookkeeping which has been adopted in the District in connection with titles, taxes, and matters of that kind. It is simply a change for the convenience of the office, and not a matter for legislation at all. It is a matter within the control of the administration of the department of the District. Now, of course, when an additional officer shall have been created for such an office it is a change of the law, and will be referred, necessarily and properly, to the Committee on Appropriations to make the necessary appropriation.

The expenditure of this sum is not necessarily the work of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but properly pertains to the business of the Committee on Appropriations, whose duty it is to examine all of these expenditures and make provision to meet them. It is a question absolutely to be determined by that committee. It is not a question as to the right of the Committee on the District of Columbia to enact a law requiring an appropriation, but it is the direct duty of the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate, under the law, to meet this expenditure if it be necessary. If the appropriation is needed, when the urgent deficiency bill comes up for consideration to-morrow the gentleman himself can move an amendment, and I assure him for one that I will vote for it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this bill; but it seems to me a very strange matter, when I had heard the argument of gentlemen in opposition to the bill, that while they do not assert any doubt as to the merits of the bill itself, they base their opposition to it upon the ground that it comes from a committee which, as they allege, has no right under the rules to make the necessary appropriation to carry it into effect.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is simply the destruction of the orderly procedure of the House.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman is therefore a stickler for orderly procedure, especially in this case?

Mr. BINGHAM. Unquestionably; because each committee has its rights, powers, and privileges.

Mr. SIMS. Well, we will see whether that has been the case heretofore, or not. The gentleman will doubtless remember—certainly the House does—the sharp debate between the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. CANNON, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HERBURN] last winter, in which it was charged that the Committee on Appropriations had deliberately and was daily violating the rules of the House, in that in the preparation of bills by the Appropriations Committee appropriations were made not authorized by existing law or ingrafting new legislation upon appropriation bills. In that debate, upon my inquiry, the distinguished chairman, Mr. CANNON, stated that the rules were operative only when invoked. If unanimous consent is asked for the consideration of a bill in this House and no objection is made, and consideration of the bill is accordingly begun, is it any argument against the bill on its merits that objection ought to have been made, but was not?

If the gentlemen opposing this bill because it carries an appropriation thought it violated the rules, why did they not make such objection at the proper time, as they are so contentious for orderly procedure? Not having made objection, the bill is now before the House in an orderly and proper way, and the House is competent to deal with it on its merits, and I can see no use in sending this bill to the Appropriations Committee to do what the House can now do without any circumlocution.

We have a proposition here which has received a great deal of consideration from some of the members of this body. If the legislation is good, we ought to adopt it. We come directly to you with the bill and the single proposition to carry it into effect.

Admitting that the objection would have been good if it had been made in time, it does seem to me that these gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee ought to be a little delicate now in asking the House to vote down a bill that they did not think worthy of their objection. While we do not wish to encroach upon the powers of the Committee on Appropriations, I do think that necessary legislation should not be defeated on the ground that we have not first knocked at that door. I hope gentlemen will either vote for or against this bill upon its merits. If it is wrong in principle, I am willing to vote against it, but I am not willing to vote against it simply because it may have been subject to a point of order which was not made. Therefore I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] will be voted down, as I think it ought to be.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the very fact that, as stated by the gentleman, the Commissioners have already entered upon this work, shows that there is no necessity for this legislation. The only necessity is for the appropriation. Why, then, do the Commissioners go to the District Committee? Why did they not come to the Appropriations Committee? This bill was introduced by the Chairman of the District Committee, and he had it referred to his own committee. Then, as I stated before, he sent down to the Committee on Appropriations another bill with the indorsement, to use his own language, that it required an appropriation if passed. Now, there is not a dollar appropriated in the bill. The whole core of the provision of the bill is to extend the eight-hour law to policemen in this District. That is the whole story. Yet he sent it down to the Committee on Appropriations as an unfit thing for his committee to deal with. His committee is the only committee that can deal with it, and I notify the gentleman again that at the first opportunity I shall go into the House and ask to have this bill re-referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and not let them say that it is buried in the Committee on Appropriations, which can not deal with it.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say to the gentleman that if his committee will release their hold upon that bill and refer it back to the District Committee, so that they can have a chance to act upon it, policemen in this District will not be subject to work more than eight hours a day.

Mr. GROUT. All right; let them settle with the policemen. We have no authority over that legislation; none whatever. For my part I do not see why the District Committee showed such promptness to take possession of a bill appropriating $4,000, and yet had referred to the Committee on Appropriations a bill which only in a very indirect way would call for an appropriation. It is true that, if the eight-hour law is inaugurated on the police force, it will make necessary more policemen, because the policemen work more hours than that now.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. I think I hardly stated myself fairly a few moments ago. The only change that the Commissioners have made so far is to purchase the cards.

Mr. GROUT. What business had they to purchase the cards if they had not the authority to do it?

Mr. JENKINS. They had authority to purchase them out of their stationery account, and now they ask Congress for the necessary power to carry out the project.

Mr. GROUT. They had no authority, only as they exercised it under the organic act. As I told the House a moment since, the Commissioners have full authority to inaugurate the system whenever the money is given to them. They do not need this legislation.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. We are not opposing this bill, so far as the granting of authority is concerned. It is not necessary, but I do not object. We simply say drop out the appropriation. Let us act in accordance with the rules of the House. Let the appropriation be authorized by the Committee on Appropriations. Let this appropriation be presented either in the urgent deficiency bill, when it will receive just consideration by the House, or let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and let the proper subcommittee deal with it. That is all we say.

Mr. LLOYD. I would like to ask the gentleman before he sits down whether this bill is meritorious or not.

Mr. GROUT. I am glad the gentleman asked me that, because I wish to say that I do not know. We have been quoted as conceding that this is a valuable system. I do not concede it. I do not know. The matter has never been before our committee. I have no information upon the subject. I know that in the War Department it is made available with great profit to the Government, but whether in the District office in tax matters it can be I do not know. I think it is a matter of question. I know some think it can not be made available.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Can it possibly be a meritorious bill if it simply authorizes the Commissioners to do what they can already do?

Mr. GROUT. That is a question which it seems to me answers itself. There is no occasion whatever for the bill except the appropriation, and that should have gone to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BINGHAM) there were—ayes 24, noes 48.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5043), and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RIGHTS OF ALIENS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago House bill 5297 was laid aside temporarily. I ask for the further consideration of that bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5297) to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, since the bill was laid aside an amendment has been agreed upon which I think is satisfactory to everyone in the House that has considered it. It covers the point that the committee desire to cover, and that is this—it gives to those people that are now without power either to sell or dispose of their property here in the District of Columbia the right to do so for a period of ten years. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That aliens making claim to title of real estate in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to sell and dispose of such claims to citizens of the United States within ten years from the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the amendment recommended by the committee to the text of the bill, and not the amendment just read.

Mr. RIDGELY. Can we not make some arrangement for a division of time for discussion? We certainly are not going to pass that without any discussion whatever.

Mr. BABCOCK. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like to have at least thirty minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. This bill has been discussed nearly all the afternoon. I would be disposed to yield any reasonable time.

Mr. RIDGELY. What would you be disposed to yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. Five minutes.

Mr. RIDGELY. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it was almost impossible for us to hear the reading of the bill or understand the discussion on it for some time, and in my effort to obtain the floor I was ruled out. I would like a few minutes. It may not take thirty minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes. We have some other measures we want to dispose of.

Mr. RIDGELY. Very well; I will take that and trust to be able to obtain further time if I find it necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, referring to an incident in the beginning of the consideration of this bill, I call attention to the fact that, through the kindness of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who, by reason of his fortunate nearness to the gentleman in charge of the pending bill, believing that we on this side did not understand what was transpiring, very kindly favored us with a warning, and especially took pains to call the attention of Populists to the fact that it attacked one of our well-known and oft-declared principles—that alien ownership of real estate in this nation should be absolutely prohibited. In view of this favor, which I accept and again thank the gentleman for it; I take this opportunity to say to members here that it is one of the fundamental principles of the Populist party to abolish not only alien landlordism but all landlordism; but I would also impress upon you the fact that it is to the shame of some other parties in this country that it has been necessary for the Populist party to remind the nation that it should always be an irrevocable principle of our Government to prohibit aliens from owning and controlling real estate.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit an inquiry?

Mr. RIDGELY. I will, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Some two or three years ago, prior to the consideration of the bill to modify the act of 1887, is it not true that one of the Populist conventions in your district passed a resolution demanding the passage of the act of 1897?

Mr. RIDGELY. I have no recollection of any such action, nor do I believe any Populist convention ever indorsed alien ownership of anything in our country.

Mr. SIMS. That has nothing to do with the bill before the House.

Mr. RIDGELY (continuing). I cannot yield further unless my time is to be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RIDGELY. I will take the balance of my time now to remind members here that it is not only one of the doctrines of the Populist party that we exclude absolutely alien ownership of land within the United States, but we even go further and warn the country against permitting the titles to real estate or other property to be centralized in individuals or corporations, either home or foreign. It is now proposed by this pending legislation to legalize titles that are now illegal in the hands of alien owners in the District of Columbia. It is proposed to legalize them for ten years.

The bill does not say that if not then transferred to the ownership of citizens of this country we will then enforce our present rights and that the property shall then escheat to the Government. I shall offer, when the proper time comes, an amendment that will compel the transfer of these titles within a limited time or they shall escheat to the Government.

Gentlemen say that rather than do injustice to some foreign investor we had better extend the time and let them go on and collect the rents until the end of the ten years, when, forsooth, we may then conclude that we have extended the time long enough. I hope the country will understand this legislation, and I hope the representatives of the people of this nation here and now will be true to the well-known sentiment of this country and vote down this proposed measure or at least cut the time down. Two years is certainly sufficient; and then let us put into the legislation a positive order that if the title does not pass to some citizen of this country within that time it shall be forfeited to the Government of the United States. Let us prepare to enforce existing law after reasonable notice. At least let us act in accordance with fundamental principles.

I hope gentlemen will not fail to give this matter the attention that it demands, and the attention that the people of this country require at our hands. When the proper time comes I shall offer these amendments, believing that my time is too short to enter into a full discussion and to call the attention of the House to the position taken by the various political parties on this question of land titles. I only wish to emphasize my protest against the proposed legislation now before us, which indicates that there is a growing sentiment and a growing political force within capitalistic circles in this country that stands ready to begin to legalize alien ownership of real estate within our borders, even within the very capital of the nation itself, against which I believe the people generally, of all political parties, are emphatically opposed.

I wish to state, before I take my seat, that I shall offer the amendments I have spoken of, and if in order at this time I will offer them now.

Mr. JENKINS. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments are not in order, as the floor was not yielded for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. RIDGELY. I will state in my time, then, what my amendments will be when the time comes for me to offer them. I shall offer to strike out the word "ten" in next to the last line and insert the word "two," and to add at the end of the last line a provision that the title to the property of all aliens shall escheat to the United States Government if not transferred to a citizen of this country within the two years' limit.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. JENKINS. I will.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas has reiterated his devotion to the principles of the Populist party. I had no doubt but that he would do so here. I want to call attention, however, to the fact that the Populist party that he speaks for has on many occasions, certainly one notable one, laid down the principle of nonownership when it suited their convenience and when he thought it was for their interest. They have declaimed year after year against alien ownership; they have made that one of the foundation planks of their platform, State and national; they have gone to the people insisting that under the laws as they were permitted to be by the Republican party, and by the Democratic party when it had power, there was large acquisition of lands by foreigners, harmful to the interests of the country and foreboding great danger.

I want him to remember that a few years ago, when they found that it was absolutely necessary that foreign capital should be invited into the Territories to secure their development, they came here asking modifications of the law so that this alien ownership might occur, in order that mortgages might be given, that bonds might be issued, that securities might be made whereby they could get the needed money to carry on enterprises and develop the Territories.

And when this modification, only two or three years ago, Mr. Speaker, was pending, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] gave to the House some information upon the point, showing that in a Populist convention, in one of the counties of the district now represented by the gentleman from Kansas, there was a demand for the passage of just this very law, and insisting that we should abrogate these statutes forbidding the acquisition of property by foreigners. And why, Mr. Speaker? Simply because it was to the interest of certain parties in that State.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. HEPBURN. I always yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. RIDGELY. If such legislation was passed, was it not because of the fact that your policy of reducing the currency, contracting the circulating medium of the people, destroyed the credit of the whole country in their own country, compelled them to cross the seas to get money to develop our resources?

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, Mr. Speaker, who was it that destroyed your credit in that country? Was it not the infamous threat that you made in your own State, that you would withdraw the facilities of the courts from your creditors and make it impossible for them to collect their debts? You threatened that there should be a stay of five years in your State between the suit and the collection of the claim and that the courts should not be used by the creditor who sought to enforce the law. Was it not you who introduced bills in the legislature allowing a period of three years between the inception of a suit and the trial of it? Was it not because you interposed this length of time between the trial of the suit and the collection of the debt that the trouble to which the gentleman has referred arose?

You yourself introduced bills making three years the time between the commencement of the suit and the possible satisfaction of the judgment. You proposed, in the first place, a stay of execution for five years. If such legislation was introduced, what could you expect other than the result which you finally accomplished? That is what destroyed your credit. It was your own attempt to rob your creditors after having secured their money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call attention to the fact that these purists, these men "holier than thou," these men that up to four years ago were the denunciators of their own present allies, these men who insisted that all corruption was to be found in the two old parties and that all purity was to be found in theirs, these gentlemen who claimed the necessity for organizing a new party because the two old parties had forgotten their duty and were recreant to their obligations—these gentlemen, after announcing principles, after eulogizing them upon the stump, are always ready to sacrifice them, always ready to let them slip by if they can secure an advantage for themselves; just as the gentleman's own people, in one of his own counties, solemnly resolved—I am not quoting literally—that land ownership by foreigners was not so bad a thing if they could only secure money in their own locality for the purpose of carrying on local developments.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman produce a copy of the resolution to which he refers?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know that I can, but the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] made the statement here in the House, and had the resolution. I am not sure whether it was read or not; and neither the gentleman nor any of his colleagues had the temerity at that time to deny its authenticity.

Mr. JENKINS rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes in which to reply.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin yields to the gentleman from Kansas five minutes.

Mr. RIDGELY. I thank the gentleman for the time. Now, in reply to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has charged against my people and my State, I simply say that he has but repeated what, in the heat of a political contest, came as a charge from his party and his party press against our people, the charge that we had turned repudiators because we were demanding some legislation that might better protect the debtor.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. RIDGELY. I yield for a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will ask you if, in your own legislature, bills of the character I have suggested were not introduced and their passage prevented solely because of the desertion of three of your people, who refused to carry them out?

Mr. RIDGELY. I answer emphatically no; that we never proposed repudiation, or any act that squinted toward it, in the State from which I come.

Mr. HEPBURN. Hold on; do not beg the question in that way. I did not use the word "repudiation."

Mr. RIDGELY. I call for the minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I said that you proposed that an interval of three years should elapse between the commencing of a suit and its day of trial in court. I said that you proposed a stay of execution for five years—

Mr. RIDGELY. I hope the gentleman will not take up all my time.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask you if such legislation was not introduced in your legislature and supported by your people?

Mr. RIDGELY. I hope I may be permitted time enough to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas declines to yield further.

Mr. RIDGELY. It is an old charge that is being again revived. For many years my State did not give the privilege to debtors that almost every State in this Union does give and that the gentleman's own State gives to the debtor—that is, the privilege of redemption when a foreclosure of a mortgage is made. We asked in Kansas that we might simply follow the well-known practice and law of other States, and give to our debtors the privilege of three years, the gentleman says.

Mr. HEPBURN. Five years.

Mr. RIDGELY. Well, I care not as to the difference between us as to the time, sir. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] I say that the legislation in behalf of the debtor is as noble and worthy of defense as the eternal legislation in behalf of the creditor. Why, I wish to cite you to the fact that the law that finally was passed and is now upon the statute books of my State does give to the debtor eighteen months in which to redeem his home that has been foreclosed under a mortgage, and your State and others have similar laws, some of them running as long as three years.

And, forsooth, because we have done this little act of justice to struggling debtors you must arraign us here as tending in the direction of repudiators. This charge I resent. I say it is untrue of my people. There is no such sentiment in my State. All we ask is that the debtor shall be heard and recognized as having some rights and claims under and within the laws of the country, and that, too, without this eternal howling charge of repudiation.

The gentleman refers to a matter which he can not here substantiate. He makes the assertion that because under some conditions our people may have asked a chance to borrow foreign money that we are inconsistent because our general policy and plea is, and the plea that we make here to-day is, that alien ownership shall be restricted and absolutely forbid. He takes this occasion to air the old charge of his party and its press against the good people of Kansas, and in that arraignment and false charge you are hurting your own constituency in my State as well as all others.

Mr. HEPBURN. Allow me to correct the gentleman. Not against the good people of Kansas, but the Populists of Kansas. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RIDGELY. The good people of Kansas have already enacted the very law that you here condemn and arraign, and it stands there and will remain, no matter which party has charge of legislative affairs; nor has the credit of my people suffered by it; their credit is as good as that of any State in the Union.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to shut off any amendments; but during the discussion of this question this morning the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had some opposition to the pending bill, and we referred the whole subject of amendment to that gentleman. I do not see him here; but I am informed by my colleague on the committee from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] that this substitute, which is now in the hands of the Clerk, was prepared by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] or by the gentleman from Kentucky [Judge SMITH], and that it received the approval of the gentleman from Texas, and that all gentlemen who opposed the bill this morning were in favor of the amendment as drawn by the gentleman from Kentucky. Therefore, I prefer to submit the question to the House on the pending substitute, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is a committee amendment reported, and the vote must first be on that amendment to perfect the text of the bill. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. RIDGELY. I would ask for the reading of the amendment, please.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 7, after the word "same," insert the words "rights and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment last offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. JENKINS. That is a substitute for that section.

The SPEAKER. To strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Let us have that read.

The SPEAKER. It has already been read, but without objection the Clerk will again read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That aliens making claim to title of real estate in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to sell and dispose of such claims to citizens of the United States within ten years from the passage of this act."

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moves to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, we have simply agreed to the substitute. We have not yet passed the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the substitute was adopted and the bill was passed.

Mr. RIDGELY. I do not so understand the situation.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill has not been read a third time, and has not been engrossed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The third reading and the engrossment of the bill has not been had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was misinformed. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to this. I was not here when the matter was discussed, but if I caught the reading of this substitute, if it should become law to-day, a foreigner might buy real estate here—

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wait a minute—and hold that real estate for ten years, and then sell it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The intention of it is that it shall apply to real estate that is held throughout the city now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. For the satisfaction of a number of gentlemen around me, I ask that the substitute may be reread. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. The substitute has already been reported twice, but without objection it will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That aliens making claim to title of real estate in the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to sell and dispose of such claims to citizens of the United States within ten years after the passage of this act."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, my objection is correctly taken. The word "now" should be put there, so that it would apply to real estate owned by aliens at present, but not to property that they may acquire at any time within ten years. I think my construction is correct.

Mr. JENKINS. I will ask unanimous consent to have the word "now" put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state his request.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask unanimous consent to have the word

"now" placed in the substitute, being the first word of the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report, as requested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "aliens" insert the word "now;" so as to read, "that aliens now making claim," etc.

Mr. JENKINS. That will cover the case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to insert the word "now" as indicated by the reading. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. I want to know at what stage of the proceedings it would be in order to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been asked for, but the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. JENKINS. I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Kansas that if the previous question is voted down, the matter will not then be in order; but if it is agreed to, a motion to recommit will then be in order after the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for the previous question on the engrossment and passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY] that the motion to recommit is now in order.

Mr. RIDGELY. I will offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions that they bring in an amendment limiting the time to two years, and that the title shall escheat to the Government on all alien claims after the expiration of the two years. At the suggestion of gentlemen here, Mr. Speaker, I will make it five years instead of two years.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, that he may see that he is correctly stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read, "within five years." Also, insert, "The title shall escheat to the Government of all alien titles to real estate after such period."

Mr. RIDGELY. That is my motion; to recommit with those instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RIDGELY) there were—ayes 58, noes 88.

Mr. RIDGELY. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 142, answered "present" 6, not voting 118; as follows:

Mr. SHOWALTER with Mr. RIORDAN.
Mr. HARMER with Mr. KLUTZ.
Mr. CORLISS with Mr. STALLINGS.
Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. HALL for the rest of the session.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.
The question was taken, and the bill was passed.
Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WILSON]. I voted inadvertently and desire to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the vote has already been announced on the question to which he refers.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote just taken on the passage of the bill, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title of the bill will be amended to conform to the action of the House.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence for my colleague from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] indefinitely, who is detained on account of important business.

There was no objection.

REFERENCE OF A HOUSE BILL.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill (H. R. 2736) to change the name of The Potomac Insurance Company, of Georgetown, and for other purposes, will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There was no objection and it was so ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. BABCOCK (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the bay at Hudson, Pasco County, Fla.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting the thirteenth annual report of the Commission—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of David L. Lillard against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the support of children at the Whitaker Orphan Home, Indian Territory—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation to pay George Green certain fees—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, recommending an authorization for the accounting officers of the Treasury to pass an account for the payment of William S. Yeatman for services rendered the Gettysburg National Military Park Commission—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Richard Poole, administrator of estate of Frederick S. Poole, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of William V. Rose against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending the reimbursement of John E. Crane, United States Commissioner in Alaska, for expenses incurred by him in relieving destitute and sick Americans at Circle City, Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation for renting additional office room in the building known as the Hooe Building—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of deficiency appropriation for military posts—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, reported the same, accompanied by a report (No. 43); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4036) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to change the material to be used in the construction of the dry docks at the navy-yards at League Island, Pa., and Mare Island, Cal., from timber to concrete and stone, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 45); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will, without objection, stand approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting certain information relative to a grant of land made September 25, 1889, by the Government of Spain to the Indians of the Pueblo of Zuni, in the Territory of New Mexico, and recommending that the grant be formally and expressly confirmed by the Congress, together with copies of correspondence on the subject and a transcript of the record of the claim of these Indians from the files of the General Land Office and of a proposed bill to confirm the title in question; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, a copy of the report of the Auditor for the War Department of the 9th instant, relative to the amount due the State of South Carolina growing out of the claim for moneys expended by that State for military purposes in the war of 1812 with Great Britain, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. TILLMAN, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, certain information relative to the $50,000,000 appropriated by Congress under the act approved March 9, 1896, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes," and stating that no portion of the appropriation was assigned to or expended by the Department of Agriculture; which, on motion of Mr. ALLEN, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 13th ultimo, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and accompanying copy of report of Lieut. Col. G. J. Lydecker, Corps of Engineers, relative to the number of days during the season of 1899 on which navigation was blocked by reason of an accident occurring in St. Marys River and in the St. Clair Flats Canal, respectively, also the approximate money loss to the vessel interests by reason of such delays, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5042) to provide for improvements in the tax departments of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 5297) to authorize aliens to dispose of real estate holdings in the District of Columbia.

PROTECTION OF COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a petition signed by more than 3,000 colored persons, and as it is only three or four lines long I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the petition will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To His Excellency William McKinley, President, and the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, whose names are signed to this petition, would most respectfully pray for the execution of such of our constitutional laws as shall protect the colored people and all citizens alike in and of these United States in life, civil and political liberty, which shall be effective in suppressing the barbarous custom of lynching and burning colored men.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I suppose the petition ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it relates to such legislation as is proper in the premises. I desire to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee to it, in view of the fact that I feel interest in the question involved.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois kindly have the petition read again? I did not hear it.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the petition be again read, so that he may hear what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will again be read.

The Secretary again read the petition.

Mr. CULLOM. The petition technically simply calls for the execution of laws. I happen to know from the gentleman who sends the petition, and who is at the head of an organization, a gentleman by the name of Dr. Magee, of Chicago, that they desire such legislation, if it does not already exist, as will protect colored people from lynching and murder without the authority of law. I merely desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to the petition in the hope that that committee may be able to do something that will, under the lead of the Senator, give greater protection to the colored people of this country in their rights as citizens.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I think that class of questions has heretofore gone to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULLOM. I really was not aware as to what committee the petition ought to be referred.

Mr. HOAR. But I am not sure, of course. I wish the honorable Senator, who has had such large experience in legislation, would accompany his reference with some form or scheme of legislation.

I do not suppose that any Senator would be found in this body, of any party or from any State or of any shade of opinion, who would not be glad to have some proper measure adopted which would repress this wrongdoing and which would refer all offenses or alleged offenses to the orderly, peaceable, and certain course of the laws of the different States. Certainly, with a pretty large and intimate knowledge of the members of this body, I do not know a Senator on either side of this Chamber who would not earnestly agree to that as the proper policy.

But, of course, most of the offenses which come to our knowledge through the newspaper reports are matters of which the State laws now take cognizance. It is not for want of laws against riot, laws against assault, laws against murder, especially laws to prohibit bloody and brutal and cruel offenses of this sort, that they are committed; but by what constitutional method the United States can take action, which to be efficient must have the support of juries drawn from the vicinage and of courts held in the district where the offense is committed, a district previously ascertained by law, is a very difficult inquiry.

Before this matter, to which my honorable friend has called the attention of the Judiciary Committee, passes from the Senate I wish he would give us the benefit of his counsel and advice, not as to the enormity of the offense, but as to a method which will work for its suppression.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is a matter of indifference to me whether the petition is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is best to be frank in the face of the increase of lynchings of colored people, and to say that under the Constitution, as it now reads, there is no power in Congress to prevent crimes in the States. If murders are committed from any motive or against any person and the States neglect to punish those crimes, there can not be Federal legislation to take the place of useful State laws or to repair the evil done by the nonenforcement of State laws.

The exception to that remark is, that under the fifteenth amendment, undoubtedly, in the case of crimes committed for the purpose of interfering with the right of impartial suffrage for all men, there may be national legislation to prevent crimes committed with the purpose of preventing colored people from voting.

Mr. SPOONER. There is.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is such a power?

Mr. SPOONER. There is such legislation, Federal legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is not now, as I understand it, any Federal legislation upon the statute book enacted in pursuance of the fifteenth amendment. If there is, the Senator from Wisconsin will correct me. What are called the Federal election laws were wiped off the statute book in 1893, and there is now no legislation on that subject.

The point is that while Congress can undoubtedly, if it sees fit, enact laws intended to protect the right of suffrage under the fifteenth amendment, Congress has no constitutional power to punish crime, ordinary crimes, crimes of any sort in the States unless they are connected with the suppression of the right of suffrage.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Chair will excuse me. I supposed when a petition was presented it was in order to debate the question of reference; otherwise I should have said nothing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, petitions are presented and referred without debate.

Mr. CULLOM. If I may be allowed to say simply one word, Mr. President, as to the committee to which this petition shall go—it is a matter of no concern to me. It will be well taken care of either in the Committee on Privileges and Elections or the Judiciary Committee. It occurred to me, however, that possibly if new legislation seemed to be necessary and could be had under the Constitution at all, perhaps it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts calls upon me to suggest what legislation might be deemed necessary or constitutional. I thought, just as has been said, that it might be doubtful whether we could go any further than we have already gone under the Constitution without a constitutional amendment. But here comes a petition with 3,230 signers, all colored persons, I believe, making this petition. It seemed to me that it was incumbent upon the Senate, through its proper committee and through the Senate itself, if the committee could find that we have any power to do anything, to undertake to do it; and nobody, it seemed to me, was more able to discover what ought to be done and could be done than the Judiciary Committee, with its very able and long-experienced chairman, the Senator from Massachusetts. So I simply suggested that it go there for investigation and report at some early day if they find it consistent to do so.

These people realize that they are being badly treated; that they are killed, lynched, and punished in all kinds of ways without law in different parts of the country, and it ought to be stopped if it can be. Therefore they prepared this petition which I have presented, and which I hope will go to the Judiciary Committee, unless there is reason or objection to its going there.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois tell us whether he knows what is the cause or immediate reason for this petition being presented? I understood him to say it was from some colored persons in Chicago.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; the petition comes to me from a gentleman in Chicago; but, as I understand it, it is signed by people in different parts of the country, possibly out of the State of Illinois as well as in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wished to know whether the immediate reason for it was the treatment of colored people in Illinois or in the South.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know that, sir. I do know, however—I am perfectly frank to state it—that there were five or six or eight colored people in my own State who were shot down on the street or on the common without cause; and I am gratified to say that thirty or forty men are already in jail, and some of the persons who were charged with the offense are being tried for the offense committed, and I trust that under the administration of the governor of Illinois the crowd of men guilty of that offense will be punished under the law of Illinois.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Wisconsin discussing this question? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. When the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was asserting a few moments ago that there was power in Congress to enact legislation to give effect to the fifteenth amendment, I stated that there was some legislation on that subject upon the statute book, to which the Senator from New Hampshire replied that there was not; that it had been repealed. I rise simply for the purpose of bringing to his notice sections 5507, 5508, and 5509 of the Revised Statutes—one punishing any attempt to intimidate voters by bribery, by threats, or to deprive anyone of the rights guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment; section 5508 punishing conspiracy to injure or intimidate citizens because they have exercised rights or privileges or because they seek to exercise rights or privileges under that amendment; and section 5509 providing that if in the act of violating any provision in either of the two preceding sections any other felony or misdemeanor be committed the offender shall be punished as provided by the laws of the State for a similar felony. Does the Senator understand that those are repealed?

Mr. CHANDLER. I stand corrected. All the Federal election laws were repealed, but the sections which the Senator has read were originally enacted, I think, as a part of the civil-rights act, and they remain upon the statute book.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Nebraska discussing the question?

Mr. ALLEN. I shall not detain the Senate long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will look at the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution he will see that there can be no reasonable question about the power of Congress to protect this class of people in the exercise of their rights and privileges:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside—may not be entirely popular with certain classes in the United States, but I hold to the doctrine that the power to make citizenship carries with it the power to protect that citizen in the exercise of his right, and that the constitutional shield and statutes enacted pursuant to the Constitution follow the individual in protecting him not only in the exercise of his political rights but in his person; and if he is a citizen of the United States as distinguished from a citizen of the State, a distinction created for the first time by this amendment to the Constitution, the Federal power may follow him wherever he may go within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and protect him wherever he may be. If the States are derelict in the exercise of their power to protect him and punish crime against his rights, he being a citizen of the United States as distinguished from a citizen of a State or concurrently with the citizenship of a State, the Federal courts have power, or may be given power by statute, to afford that protection, and Congress ought not to undertake to shirk its responsibility and refuse to enact a proper statute.

Says this amendment. I know, Mr. President, that my belief

Now, I know nothing about the merits of a controversy of this kind. I observe from time to time in the press accounts of what are looked upon, and properly so, as outrages against the rights of this class of people. I wish to say that no doubt in almost every instance, if not in every case, there is great provocation for the crime that is committed. It is within the power of the Congress of the United States to enact laws to protect citizens of the United States, white or black, and it is within the power of the executive branch of the Government to enforce those statutes on every foot of every State, Territory, and District within the jurisdiction of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BATE presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Clarksville, Tenn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Butler Boyd and sundry other citizens of Clarksville, Tenn., and the petition of Jesse L. Nelson, of Jackson, Tenn., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TURLEY presented petitions of C. A. Dachsel, of Memphis; of the officers of the State Druggists' Association, and of the Thacher Medicine Company, of Chattanooga, all in the State of Tennessee, praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the Woman Suffrage Association of Jersey City, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to omit the word "male" from the constitution of Hawaii, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Redbank, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Johnson & Johnson, of New Brunswick, N. J., and a petition of sundry druggists of Asbury Park, N. J., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Marine Society of New York City, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase American shipping; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, praying for an increase of the artillery force of the Army for coast defenses; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I present a petition of 328 inspectors of customs at the port of New York, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 2006, regulating the compensation of customs inspectors at that port. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Petition for the readjustment of compensation of customs inspectors at the port of New York.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a committee representing 328 inspectors of customs at the port of New York, respectfully submit to your honorable bodies the following memorial and statement for the purpose of inviting your attention to the injustice suffered by these officers, owing to their long service of three hundred and sixty-five days of each year, being subject to duty from sunrise to sunset of each day, being many hours of labor in excess of that of other per diem employees of the Government, which hardship and injustice your committee on behalf of the said 328 inspectors of customs respectfully pray may be corrected by the passage of Senate bill No. 2006 or House bill No. 5017, introduced respectively by Senator THOMAS C. PLATT and Representative GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, entitled "A bill fixing the compensation of customs inspectors at the port of New York, in lieu of extra compensation for night services hereafter to be rendered in the examination of baggage, and for other purposes."

The following facts are stated in the hope and belief that your honorable bodies may pass one or the other of the said bills, which, if enacted into law, would increase the inspectors' compensation but $1 per day in lieu of extra compensation for night services hereafter to be rendered in the examination of baggage, for which they were formerly paid the sum of $2.50 extra per night. These officers are compelled, by reason of the nature of their services, to leave their homes at a very early hour in the morning and to incur an expense for meals and transportation of from 75 cents to $1 per day, which leaves their actual compensation about $3 per day—less than the average longshoreman receives for his services on the same docks where customs inspectors are required to supervise their work of unloading cargoes.

Customs inspectors who are competent to discharge a steamer and render a correct account of her cargo must be possessed of a high order of intelligence and deserve and should receive much higher pay than an ordinary clerk. The duties and responsibilities are certainly much greater than those of many clerks in the custom-house receiving from $1,800 to $2,500 per annum.

Inspectors detailed to discharge a steamer's cargo are required to be at their vessel ready for business never later than 7 o'clock in the morning from the time of her arrival until cargo is finally and completely disposed of. From early morning until sunset they must be skillful, alert, and unflagging in their duties. This would ordinarily be considered a long, hard day's work, but in addition they are frequently ordered to report at headquarters at the Barge Office after sunset and detailed for examination of incoming passengers' baggage at the various steamship docks, where they are often detained until midnight or even later, but it is absolutely necessary that they shall be at their several vessels promptly the next morning ready to resume the discharge of cargo.

The landing of passengers at night and the examination of their baggage has come to be a permanent practice, and certainly the United States Government should not compel its officers to perform these extra duties without an increase of compensation. The addition of $1 per day, as proposed by the bills referred to, to the present salaries, although inadequate, would be satisfactory, on the whole, to the customs inspectors.

The law regarding persons receiving per diem compensation in the service of the Government, limiting their hours of labor to eight hours per day, would seem to apply to inspectors, but if enforced in their case would necessitate the employment of more than double the number of officers now in the service.

Official statistics show that more than 60 per cent of the revenue from duties is collected at the port of New York, and over 90 per cent of the traveling public arrive at this port each year.

By a circular of the Treasury Department dated April 4, 1894 (Synopsis 14864), collectors of customs were authorized to permit the landing of passengers' baggage under the regulations governing the landing of cargoes at night under special license. This was to be done upon the application of agents or owners of steamships in the foreign trade, who were required to deposit a sufficient sum of money to cover the necessary disbursements of inspectors for this extra service, and the collectors were authorized to distribute the amount so deposited to the officers in accordance with the time which they were employed, not to exceed $2.50 for each night. This practice continued for about one year, when it was decided by the Solicitor of the Treasury—as appears by Department Circular of April 18, 1895 (Synopsis, 15917)—that passengers' baggage was not included in the word "cargo" as used in section 2871, Revised Statutes, and therefore the collection of moneys for the steamship companies to pay for this extra service was illegal. The Department, however, continued the practice of examining baggage after sunset, but denied to the officers any compensation for their services in that connection, and such practice continues to this day, thus adding greatly to the onerous duties of inspectors and involving increased personal expense to them.

Prior to 1864 the pay of inspectors of customs was limited by law to $1 per diem (section 2733, Rev. Stat.). By section 2737, Revised Statutes, however, taken from the act of April 23, 1864, the Secretary was authorized to increase the compensation of inspectors, at such ports as he might deem advisable to do so, by adding to their compensation at that time a sum not exceeding $1 per day, so that under the law, as it now stands, $1 per diem is the maximum compensation an inspector can receive. But the business of the port of New York has since that time increased enormously, and the work required of inspectors has correspondingly increased in volume and importance. In 1866, and for a number of years thereafter, most of the importations came in sailing vessels of medium tonnage, the discharge of which was comparatively simple and easy. Now the great bulk of the business is done by large trans-Atlantic steamers carrying from 5,000 to 15,000 tons of freight, the discharge of which demands the services of two inspectors in each case, and the work of tallying and accounting for these great cargoes requires the exercise of great skill, discretion, and integrity. Besides the discharge of imports, the export business has grown to immense proportions, and in cases where drawback is claimed the work must be done under the constant supervision of an inspector in order that frauds may be prevented and the interests of the Government properly guarded.

The port of New York includes the river front of Jersey shore, Brooklyn, and Staten Island, as well as the frontages on North and East rivers, and includes all the territory as far south as Bayonne, involving considerable traveling expenses between the barge office and those points, being frequently repeated several times in one day.

The failure of the Government to reimburse them for transportation expenses and for meals necessarily obtained away from their homes is exceptional, other employees of customs being allowed such expenses.

Your committee respectfully submit that the foregoing statement fully establishes the merits of the application of the inspectors of customs at the port of New York for the additional compensation of $1 per day. Throughout the entire country, especially in large manufacturing centers, the wages of workmen are being increased on account of the increased cost of living, and this in cases where the great bulk of the employees are not skilled workmen or laborers. In nearly every branch or department of labor in private employ skilled labor is receiving greater compensation than a similar class of labor in the Government service, while in nearly all branches of such service the hours of labor are restricted to one-third of the day.

For the reasons and considerations herein stated, your committee respectfully ask the enactment into law of one of the bills designated, for which, as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

Mr. McBRIDE presented the memorial of Abigail Scott Duniway, president, and Frances E. Gottshall, secretary, on behalf of the Equal Suffrage Association of Oregon, remonstrating against the use of the word "male" in the suffrage clauses of the constitution for the government of Hawaii, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines, and praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of citizens of the United States on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of Camp No. 17, Indian War Veterans, of Albany, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation to pension Indian war veterans of the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HANNA presented the petition of E. B. Howard & Co., of Akron, Ohio, and the petition of S. E. Allen and sundry other citizens of Akron, Ohio, praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of W. B. Tubbs and sundry other citizens of Ridgeville Corner, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale or disposing of cigarettes or cigarette wrappers in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the survivors of the First and Second Kentucky Regimental Association, held at Central Turner Hall, Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the passage of a per diem pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented sundry petitions of railway mail clerks of Delaware, Sidney, Wooster, Painesville, Lorain, Marion, and Mansfield, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of U. J. Favorite, of Tippecanoe City, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation allowing artificial limbs to pensioners; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLCOTT presented the petition of Mrs. Albert L. Welch, president, and Mrs. George A. Smith, secretary, on behalf of the non-Partisan Equal Suffrage Association of Colorado, praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of citizens on account of sex, and remonstrating against the insertion of the word "male" in the suffrage clause of the constitution for the government of Hawaii, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. WETMORE. I present, by request, the petition of Helen Rand Tindall, president, and Henrietta C. Morrison, secretary, on behalf of the Equal Suffrage Association of the District of Columbia, praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of United States citizens on account of sex. I move that the petition be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of 83 railway mail clerks of Minneapolis, Minn., and a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Stillwater, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Martha J. Thompson, president, and Ethel Edgerton Hurd, secretary, on behalf of the Woman Suffrage Association of Minnesota, praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. QUARLES presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Neenah, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Michigan City, Ind., and a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Fort Wayne, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of the Equal Rights Association of South Carolina, praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Greenville, S. C., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class postoffices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I present a paper in the form of a protest of the Turtle Mountain Indians against Senate bill 161 and in favor of Senate bill 1932. The protest is not signed by any of the Indians interested, but it bears the signature of a person who claims to be the attorney for the Indians. I also submit a letter to accompany the statement. I move that the memorial and accompanying letter be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a petition of citizens of Buffalo County, S. Dak., praying to have the laws of the United States apply to all crimes committed on Indian reservations. As it is, a large class of the crimes committed on a reservation are subject to the laws of the State. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and at a future day I shall introduce a bill covering the subject. I did introduce such a bill a year or two ago, but nothing was done with it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the memorial of Ella Harrison, president, and Dr. Marie E. Adams, secretary, on behalf of the Woman's Suffrage Association of Missouri, remonstrating against the use of the word "male" in the suffrage clause of the Constitution for the government of Hawaii, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines, and praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a memorial of the Missouri State Grange, remonstrating against the adulteration and misbranding of foods and drugs; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the Missouri Viava Company, of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the legislative committee of the Missouri State Grange, remonstrating against the operation of combinations or trusts; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CHILTON presented the petition of Maggie S. Beck and sundry other citizens of Hillsboro, Tex., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the National Woman's Suffrage Association of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting disfranchisement on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. DANIEL presented the petition of Mary Male, widow of Robert Male, praying that her name be placed upon the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. B. Hall and sundry other citizens of Fredericksburg, Va., and the petition of R. C. Petzold and sundry other citizens of Newport News, Va., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of J. Moten and sundry other citizens of Virginia, praying that an appropriation be made to pay the depositors in the Freedman's Savings Bank and Trust Company; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented sundry petitions of railway mail clerks of Lynchburg, Winchester, and Roanoke, all in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Marine Society of New York City, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase American shipping; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPER ON POLYGAMY.

Mr. RAWLINS. I present a statement which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It relates to the subject of polygamy, and should be considered in connection with other papers on that subject.

There being no objection, the paper was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

POLYGAMY AND UNLAWFUL COHABITATION.

From the reading of the various editorials and articles of the public press it is evident that there is much misconception and misunderstanding as to the present attitude of our church respecting the subjects of polygamy and unlawful cohabitation, and, believing that many good and conscientious people have been misled and much adverse criticism occasioned thereby, I feel it but just to both "Mormons" and "non-Mormons" to state that, in accordance with the manifesto of the late president Wilford Woodruff, dated September 25, 1890, which was presented to and unanimously accepted by our general conference on the 6th of October, 1890, the church has positively abandoned the practice of polygamy or the solemnization of plural marriages in this and every other State and that no member or officer thereof has any authority whatever to perform a plural marriage or enter into such a relation. Nor does the church advise or encourage unlawful cohabitation on the part of any of its members. If, therefore, any member disobeys the law, either as to polygamy or unlawful cohabitation, he must bear his own burden, or, in other words, be answerable to the tribunals of the land for his own action pertaining thereto.

With a sincere desire that the position of our church as to polygamy and unlawful cohabitation may be better understood, and with best wishes for the welfare and happiness of all, this statement is made, and is respectfully commended to the careful consideration of the public generally.

LORENZO SNOW,

President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

SALT LAKE CITY, January 8, 1900.

PENSION CLAIMS OF DEPENDENT PARENTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2836) repealing section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, so far as the same may be applicable to the claims of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain, to report it without amendment and to submit a report thereon. As it is a brief bill and is a matter of urgency, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read, and then let us have an explanation of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will make a brief statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read first.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed, so far as the same may be applicable to the claims to pension of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, section 4716 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

The brief report I have written is as follows:

So long as this section stands upon the statute books the Bureau of Pensions has no alternative but to reject all claims for dependent parents on behalf of sons who were killed or who died from disabilities incurred while serving in the war with Spain or in the Philippines. Several claims have been filed in the Bureau since the beginning of the war with Spain of this class, some of them being that of parents living in the South, where the father served in the Southern army during the civil war, or in other ways aided or abetted the Southern cause. They have of necessity been rejected under the statute as it now stands.

It seems to your committee that this condition of affairs should be promptly relieved and that so much of this section as applies to dependent parents who have lost sons while fighting under the flag during the late war should be repealed. Beyond a doubt the law was never intended to apply to cases of this kind.

Believing it to be a simple act of justice, your committee report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it pass.

Now, Mr. President, that is the purpose of the bill, and it is a good purpose. I trust it will be promptly passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire who is chairman of the Committee on Pensions if he will not include Mexican war veterans in the bill. There are only five or six thousand of those old people left, and even though they may have given comfort and aid to the rebellion there are men in this Chamber who were generals in the Confederate army, and they are not discriminated against in any shape, form, or fashion; and why should those old soldiers who fought in Mexico, and some of whom are in the poorhouse in my part of the country and can not get any increase of pension, be discriminated against on account of disability? Will he not now be liberal enough to let the Committee on Pensions accept an amendment allowing the dependent-pension act to apply to the Mexican war veterans?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I confess I do not exactly understand the drift of the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator knows that I personally am willing to do almost anything that is reasonable in regard to these matters, but here is a specific provision in the Revised Statutes which we desire to have repealed for a specific purpose, and I am sure the Senator will not encumber it with amendments which have no relevancy to the question now under consideration.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, is it not relevant to ask that the discriminations against Mexican war veterans who participated or aided in the rebellion shall be removed when it is proposed that we shall remove those against men who participated in the Spanish war? I declare I can not see where the irrelevancy comes in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I can not comprehend it. I will assure the Senator from South Carolina that if he presents a proper bill covering that point it will have the careful consideration of the committee of which I happen to be chairman; but I hope he will allow this bill to pass now, as it relates to a class of persons in his own section of the country who I think to-day are not being given their dues under the laws as they stand at the present time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Sarah T. Usher, to submit an adverse report thereon, as the beneficiary named in the bill is dead. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the same reason I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1267) granting an increase of pension to Jackson Osborn, to submit an adverse report thereon. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1176) to provide pensions for freedmen, etc., submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1711) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Green;

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 899) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. M. A. Dennis, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 147) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1387) to place Francis W. Seeley on the retired list of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1394) for the relief of Bvt. Col. Thomas P. O'Reilly, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WELLINGTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1375) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Cumberland, Md., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANNA. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2175) to restore Lieut. Samuel Howard to his proper rank, to report adversely thereon, and move its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The lieutenant having died since the bill was introduced, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 43) granting a life-saving medal of the first class to Lieut. Fidelio S. Carter, of the United States Navy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Henrietta Cummins, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 548) granting an increase of pension to John F. McMahon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 517) granting a pension to Nancy E. Neely, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1783) to provide for the construction of an inter-oceanic canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1286) for the relief of Sarah K. McLean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read at length.

The joint resolution (S. R. 65) declaring the purpose of the Government of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. First, That the Government of the United States does not consider the payment of the $20,000,000 to the Government of the Kingdom of Spain, stipulated by the treaty of Paris and made in accordance with the same, as a purchase either of lands, persons, or privileges of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, but that such payment was made with the friendly purpose of abrogating any claim of sovereignty that was then lodged in the Spanish Government, and to prevent the intervention of other foreign powers in Philippine affairs.

Second, That it is not the purpose of the Government of the people of the United States to deprive the people of the Philippine Islands of their right of self-government, and the war now being waged is not for conquest or for the permanent possession of the islands, but for the establishment of law and order, and shall cease when the Filipinos now under arms make overtures for peace, upon the condition that after the establishment of law and order the people of the island, or such islands as may desire, shall have the privilege, under the protection of the United States, of establishing a republic in which the principle of "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people" shall be absolutely preserved.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table until Thursday immediately after the routine business has been finished, when I shall desire the leave of the Senate to submit some remarks on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks that the joint resolution may lie on the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $10,000 for envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the Netherlands, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1706) for the reference of certain claims against the Government of the United States to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEN. JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. CULLOM. On December 6, 1899, I introduced a bill (S. 219) for the relief of John M. Palmer, my late colleague in this body. The bill was handed to me by a friend of General Palmer, to be introduced, for the purpose of giving the General an increase of pension from $50 to $100 per month. I thought that such a bill ought to pass and that if there was anybody in this country entitled to a pension of $100 a month General Palmer was that man. Since the introduction of the bill I have received a letter, which I take occasion to read. It is addressed to a friend of General Palmer and has been handed to me. It is as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., December 10, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your note of December 8. I could not accept an increase of my pension, because I have said to my friends that the present pension ($50) is what I desired.

I am greatly obliged to you for your effort in my behalf, because I know it was dictated by friendship for me.

Please inform Senator CULLOM of my wishes.

Yours, etc.,

JOHN M. PALMER.

THOMAS J. DONOVAN, Esq., Washington, D. C.

I have read this letter, Mr. President, because I think it is due General Palmer that it should be made public and for the purpose of asking an order that when the bill is reported by the Committee on Pensions it be indefinitely postponed by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the Senator now ask that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be now acted upon.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection, and will make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the Committee on Pensions may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 219) granting an increase of pension to John M. Palmer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the committee is discharged from the further consideration of the bill. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN CUBA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate an itemized statement of public receipts from taxation, customs, and all other sources, and also of public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses, in Cuba since the United States Government assumed control of that island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution may go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to have some orders made in regard to minority representation on the committees of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. In order that proper committee assignments may be made on this side of the Chamber, I desire to ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on the Census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the Senator from Texas be excused from further service on the Committee on the Census? The Chair hears no objection, and he is excused.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] be placed upon the Committee on the Census, in place of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who has just been excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Senators whose names I send to the desk be appointed on the committees named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order presented by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service: Messrs. TURLEY, HEITFELD, and CULBERSON.

On Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands: Messrs. CHILTON and ALLEN.

On Education and Labor: Mr. DANIEL.

On Fisheries: Mr. KENNEY.

On Mines and Mining: Mr. BUTLER.

On Patents: Mr. HEITFELD.

On Transportation Routes to the Seaboard: Mr. McLAURIN.

To Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington: Mr. BACON.

On Public Health and National Quarantine: Mr. CULBERSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order asked for by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the order will be considered as agreed to. It is agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 5042) to provide for improvements in the tax departments of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 5297) to authorize aliens to dispose of real estate holdings in the District of Columbia.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] on the 3d instant, which is on the table by virtue of an agreement. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW January 3, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torres, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1899, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Filipinos, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1899, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer." And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply; and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that resolution asks for but one item in a great mass of information which is covered by the resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. HOAR], and I said the other day when the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota was reached I should move to lay it on the table, as well as the substitute which I offered for it. I understand the Senator from South Dakota has said all he desires to say in regard to his resolution, and I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota, which has been read, together with the substitute offered by himself, lie upon the table. The question is upon that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 9th instant, which will be read.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read with the amendments which I offered.

Mr. HOAR. I accept the amendments of my colleague as part of the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendments of the junior Senator from Massachusetts will be regarded as part of the resolution, and the resolution will be read as now modified.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution as modified, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all communications which have been received by him, or by any Department or officer, civil or military, from Aguinaldo or any other person undertaking to represent the people in arms against the United States in the Philippine Islands, or any alleged government or public authority of said people, and all replies to such communications;

Also, the proclamation sent by him to be issued to the people of the Philippine Islands, as actually directed by him to be issued, and the same as actually proclaimed by General Otis, if in any respect it was altered or any part of it was omitted;

Also, to inform the Senate whether any approval or disapproval was expressed by his authority, or that of the War Department, of such change, if any;

Also, all constitutions, forms of government, or proclamations issued by Aguinaldo, or any congress or legislative assembly or body claiming to be such, or convention of the people of the Philippine Islands, or any part thereof, or claiming to represent them, or any part thereof, of which information may have come to him or to any Department of the Government;

Also, all instructions given by him to the commissioners to the Philippine Islands, or either of them;

Also, any information which may have come to him since January 1, 1898, in regard to any plans of the people in arms against the United States for the pillage of Manila, for risings in the city, or for the destruction of foreign property and the massacre of foreign residents;

Also, any information that may have come to him of the treatment of the other inhabitants of the Philippines by those in arms against the authority of the United States, and of the attitude and feeling of such other inhabitants or tribes toward the so-called government of Aguinaldo and his armed followers;

Also, any information that may have come to him of the treatment of prisoners, either Spanish or American, by the people in arms against the authority of the United States;

Also, any information that may have come to him as to any aid or encouragement received by Aguinaldo and his followers from persons in the United States, as to what pamphlets, speeches, or other documents emanating from the United States, and adverse to its authority and to its policy, were circulated, in whole or in part, among the Filipinos in arms against the United States, among the other inhabitants of the islands, or among the soldiers of the United States, and any information as to the effect, if any, of such pamphlets, speeches, and other documents, or of similar utterances in the United States upon the course of the rebellion against the United States—

Mr. HOAR. In the first line of the last clause which has been read, after the words "any information that may have come to him," I wish to insert the words "or to any Department of the Government." I have no doubt my colleague will assent to that.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Let the same words be inserted in the other clauses of the resolution where the President is called upon for any information that may come to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the words referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be inserted.

The reading of the resolution as modified was resumed and concluded, as follows:

Also, any further or other information which would tend to throw light upon the conduct and events of the insurrection against the authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands, and of the military movements for its suppression since January 1, 1898;

And that the President be further requested to communicate, without delay, so much of said information as is now in his possession, or in that of any Department at Washington, without waiting to obtain so much of said information as may require considerable delay or communication with the Philippine Islands, and to communicate the remainder of the information as soon thereafter as it can be obtained.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to amend the resolution by adding thereto a paragraph calling for all the instructions and communications upon the subject of the Spanish treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota offers an amendment which he will be kind enough to repeat.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to insert:

Also, all instructions given to the commissioners who negotiated the Spanish treaty, or any of them, and all communications on the subject between the Government and the commissioners, or any of them, pending the negotiations.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that is a matter which pertains to executive business.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by inserting:

Also, all instructions given to the commissioners who negotiated the Spanish treaty, or any of them, and all communications between the Government and the commissioners to the Philippine Islands, or any of them.

Mr. PETTIGREW. "The commissioners, or any of them, who negotiated the treaty." I want the instructions given to the commissioners at Paris, who negotiated the treaty, together with the communications made to them while the consultations were going on.

Mr. DAVIS. I raise the point of order, that that is a matter which pertains to executive business, and is, therefore, not now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be obliged to overrule the point of order. The President will have the power, of course, to return as executive matter the reply to this proposed portion of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. President, I desire to object in the strongest possible manner to the adoption of that amendment. So far as I am concerned, and so far as, I believe, any member of the commission which negotiated the treaty of Paris is concerned, there is nothing which passed between the President and any of us which any of us would fear to have disclosed or have exposed upon the pages of history.

Mr. President, I find it very difficult, under the ruling of the Chair, to speak appropriately upon this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has his remedy under the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. And I therefore move that the doors be closed as for legislative session.

Mr. SPOONER. I believe that requires a second, Mr. President? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. SPOONER. I second the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Minnesota being seconded, the doors will be closed, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries.

The doors were thereupon closed, and at the expiration of ten minutes were reopened.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. PETTIGREW. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the amendment and the original resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an amendment the following:

Also, all instructions given to the commissioners, or any of them, appointed to negotiate the Spanish treaty, and all communications between the Government and the commissioners, or any of them, while negotiations were pending at Paris that related to the negotiation of said treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (when Mr. GEAR's name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not know that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I paired with him before he left, and I supposed the pair extended to this question. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. I was not in the Chamber at the time when the amendment was read. I am informed, however, that the application for the information is made with the qualification if not deemed incompatible with the public interest, and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who, I believe, has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLEN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I also desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], who is absent, is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will take the liberty of transferring my pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who is also absent, and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. RAWLINS (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. RAWLINS. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BATE (after having voted in the negative). I understand that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DEBOE] has not voted. I should like to know what the fact is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Kentucky has not voted.

Mr. BATE. I shall have to withdraw my vote, then.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Aldrich,	Fryo,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Allison,	Gallinger,	Nelson,	Shoup,
Baker,	Hale,	Perkins,	Simon,

So Mr. PETTIGREW's amendment was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I voted "nay." I voted "nay" because it is in the power of the President, when he transmits any paper to us, to transmit it to us in secret as a proper subject for executive session. Also, it is within the power of the President, and that power can not be restricted by this body or any other, to decline, if he thinks the public interest will suffer, to transmit to us any document or any part of it. It is wholly and entirely within the province of the President to send us such information as can not in any wise interfere with the friendly relations between us and the power with which we were then negotiating, because I believe myself that all attempts to keep from the public any information which ought to go to the public has a tendency to create suspicion and engender a feeling that something they ought to know is purposely withheld.

I fully realize that there are public relations existing between us and other powers, diplomatic relations, of such a character that it would be bad faith for us to publish them to the world; and I think if any such condition exists with reference to the transactions to which the amendment refers, it would be much better for the public, much better for the Administration, much better for everybody who desires to have a friendly feeling in these matters, if the President should say to us, "In my judgment these are not matters to be made public."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I understand that this resolution—and it can not be repeated too often—refers to the President the sole and undisputed judgment whether any information asked for can be made public without detriment to the public service. Now, a Senator asks for the correspondence between the President and the commissioners who negotiated an important treaty, or either of them, and the chairman of that commission rises in his place and says that so far as he personally is concerned and so far as his associates on that commission personally are concerned there is no objection, as he believes, but that the objections, if any, are public. So the supporters of this amendment stand in the position of desiring some important information which it is to be presumed the President will think the public ought to have, because they do not ask it unless he does so, and as to which no member of the commission personally knows any reason to object, but which the majority have just voted do not want the Senate to get or the public to get. It strikes me this is a very extraordinary transaction.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have never understood that it was the right of any Senator that the Senate should adopt resolutions of inquiry because he chose to offer them. It is for the Senate; it is the Senate's inquiry when it is adopted; it is not the inquiry of any particular Senator, and it is for the Senate to judge, all things considered, whether it, as a body, will make the inquiry.

I voted in favor of laying the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota upon the table for the reason, among others, that I know, as every Senator in this Chamber knows, that as to the instructions requested here to be given to the public, and as to all the correspondence upon the subject upon the part of the commissioners, the President has been as frank with the Senate in another relation as it is possible for him to be. I can see no reason, in view of all the circumstances, which I can not give in detail, why this amendment should have been offered, except it be an attempt to put the President in the attitude of concealing something from the public. He certainly has not chosen to withhold anything upon the subject from the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would vote in favor of almost any resolution of pure inquiry into public business done by the Departments or by the President, but it seems to me that in this amendment the Senator from South Dakota sought to go too far. I should doubt—and that is why I voted "yea"—whether it would be good policy now for the Senate to say to the President that it desired all the correspondence that took place between him and the negotiators of the Paris treaty, even with the discretion on his part to refuse it. I should doubt whether the Senate should commit itself to the proposition that it seeks all that information to be made public, referring either to communications by the President to a commission or commissioners, or by the commissioners back. I do not know what the communications were. I think the result of it all was calamitous.

I voted against the treaty, and I have never seen the day since that I regretted my vote; but it does not follow, because that is my position, that I would vote in favor of ransacking the correspondence at that time and producing it to the public. It is in relation to the negotiating of a treaty. It is not simply correspondence with reference to public affairs, but it is the fine relation which exists when men get together in secret, representing different governments, and under secret instructions and private instructions seek to produce a result. Now, even though the result was wrong and calamitous, as I believe, I can not vote to ask the President, as a part of the Senate, to give to the public everything that took place there.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not willing to allow the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to pass without at least a disclaimer. So far as I am concerned, I have no desire to put the President in any unpleasant position or to intimate any lack of frankness on his part. I understand that the relation between the executive and the legislative departments when we are acting together is one of absolute independence except as the Constitution has provided how far we may control. I understand that we have no right to call on the President; that is to say, we have no means of enforcing a demand on him. We do not make any demand on him. We request him, usually with this clause, "if not incompatible with the public interest." Now, we need not insert those words. The President is the judge whether or not it is incompatible with the public interest; and suppose he declines. There is no way to compel him to furnish the information. Nobody would think of compelling him. It is discretionary with him whether he gives to the public this information or not.

Mr. HALE. There is no way to enforce it.

Mr. TELLER. There would be no way to enforce it if he said, "I decline to give you anything." There are cases, undoubtedly, where the President would be justified in saying that he would not give it to us or anybody else. They are diplomatic secrets, which must be kept in the diplomatic office—that is, the executive office of the Government—but what I contend for is that inasmuch as the President has the absolute power of selection, of saying how much the public shall have, of saying whether the public shall have any or all, there can be no objection to calling upon the President for the information and allowing him to determine the matter.

There has been a great deal said about these instructions. Without violating the secrecy of any other place, I think I can say that I know what those instructions were. There may have been something withheld, but I think I know them all, and I do not believe there is anything that would bring us into any difficulty with another nation; but if the President should say he thought that might happen, I should say it was his duty, and I should be willing to uphold his judgment, to withhold it.

The public does not know as much about these instructions as we know, and the public are debating the question whether the commission he sent there acted in accordance with justice and propriety. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says he voted against the treaty. I voted for the treaty, and I think the most unfortunate thing which has happened to us in many years is that we did not ratify that treaty within the first week. I felt so then. I thought there was great danger in the postponement of the ratification of the treaty. I believe now there is great danger in concealing from the American people any information they may need touching the question. I do not believe that the commissioner did anything or that the President did anything or that anybody else did anything that we need to be afraid of having the American people know, and if it may be valuable to us and yet might be offensive to the other side, then let the President withhold it, as he has the right to do. I am one of those who believe that a republican government must proceed, if it is to retain the support of the people, with publicity. It is the very essential basis of a free people that they should know what is done, always, of course, with certain limitations, of which I have spoken.

I wish to say to the friends of this Administration here to-day—and I am very likely on very many questions to act with them—that they are not strengthening their ground, they are not helping themselves before the public by concealing or having the public think they are concealing anything that the public should know, or that the public believe they should know, whether they ought to know it or not. If there is nothing that ought to be concealed, except upon some public ground, of our relations with a foreign power, let us have it; and if any portion of it is of such a character that we might get into difficulty, or it might be considered disrespectful to that power, let the President take that out or say to us that so much of it as he sends here ought to be kept in the privacy of executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to dispose of these resolutions, to which there is no objection. I wish we could dispose of the resolutions. This debate which is going on very interestingly about an amendment we have already voted upon can continue exactly as well after the resolutions have passed as it does now, and I think it is very desirable before 2 o'clock to get these resolutions of inquiry off the table and disposed of. I hope the Senate will allow a vote on the resolutions, and then this discussion can go on just as well.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say one word now in response to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I think this the most convenient time. I am as interested as anybody can be in the prompt passage of my resolution. The Senator from Wisconsin said what was very true, as he said it, that he did not understand every individual Senator has a right to make an inquiry; but it is the inquiry of the Senate; and that is true.

But, Mr. President, so far as I understand it, until very recent times there has been a uniform practice of the Senate to consider it a sufficient ground (there being no objection in principle or public policy to a resolution of inquiry) to make the inquiry that any single Senator thinks the information necessary for the discharge of his duty as a Senator, and the abrogation of that custom or rule, which has been universal, so far as I know, until within a few months, will, in my judgment, be a very serious diminution of the importance and dignity of the character of a Senator, which I think the course of public discussion and criticism outside of this body has tended somewhat to accomplish already, or at any rate there is danger that it may tend to accomplish it.

The ninety men who are gathered together in this Chamber have very great functions to perform. They are a body of men with whom is lodged, in conjunction with the House of Representatives and the Executive, the honor, the dignity, the interest, and the prosperity of a great people, inhabiting and controlling a great continent, now 80,000,000, and likely to be threefold that number before men who are now born and active upon the stage of life die. The Senators from New York, dividing their responsibility with each other, each alone is the representative of a people larger in numbers and infinitely greater in power and wealth than the people who fought and won the American Revolution and framed and set in operation the Constitution of the United States. I, myself, with my honored colleague, represent together a people tenfold as strong in all the elements of strength, moral and material, as the people who won our liberties in the beginning, and the men who, like the Senator who offered this amendment, represent the vast spaces in the interior are laying the foundations of a future empire, looking at their States alone, to which even that I have referred to is trivial.

It is a great thing, one of the greatest things in human history, to be a Senator of the United States, and when a man clothed with these duties, with these functions, with these responsibilities, says that he needs for the proper discharge of his duties certain public information it is no light thing to deny it; it ought to be granted. It ought to be granted by the Senate if you have the security on the one side of the Senator's affirmation that he needs it, presumed to be sincere, of course, from the character that is behind the information, and the security on the other of the Executive, who knows what we do not, that it will not be sent in if it can work the least harm to the public service.

Now, I understand that to be the rule on which the Senate has proceeded until this time, and I understand that to be the rule we have just broken in the exigencies of a bad cause.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] if he wishes to speak on this subject. I myself have but a very few remarks to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Missouri allow the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States before he proceeds?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

FOREIGN PENSION LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in response to the resolution of the Senate of January 28, 1899, directing him to "procure from the representatives of the Government abroad, for transmission to the Senate, a synopsis of the pension laws (not civil) of the leading nations of the world, with statements showing the aggregate amount of annual appropriation made by each country for the above purpose."

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Washington, January 16, 1900.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, during the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress I introduced a resolution asking for that information, and I have had great fears that it might not be obtained, so long a time has elapsed. I am very glad it has come to the Senate. I now ask that the statistics, whatever they may be, be printed and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a large mass of papers connected with this inquiry, and the Chair is of opinion that perhaps it had better go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not be better to refer it to the Committee on Pensions? They would be better able to determine whether the matter ought to be printed or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that would be the proper action, and I make the suggestion that, without printing, the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions. If hereafter the Committee on Pensions should think there are documents which ought to be printed they can make that request later on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions without printing.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. HOAR. I take the liberty of suggesting, it being seven minutes before 2, that we deal with the resolution and pass it before that hour. This matter can be delayed until after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is the desire of the Senate that these papers shall not be laid before the Senate, in order that the discussion may proceed, the Chair has no desire in relation to the matter. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 9th instant, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate certain information relative to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it seems to me most unfortunate that nothing can be said in regard to this Philippine war without improper motives being ascribed to any Senator who dares even to make an inquiry. I stated at the last session of the last Congress that the charge that I desired, directly or indirectly, to assist the enemies of the United States was a slander, whether made in this Chamber or outside of it, and I repeat that statement now. The friends of the President—and I am not his enemy—assume that any remark coming from those who opposed the Paris treaty, no matter what it may be, is an attack upon the President personally and his advisers.

Now, Mr. President, it is forgotten that at the last session of the last Congress, during the closing days of that session, the leading journals in the United States that were friendly to the policy of the Administration and the acquisition of the Philippine Archipelago by this country stated repeatedly that the President of the United States had instructed the commissioners to Paris, three of whom were members of this body at that time, there being two now remaining, that they should take Luzon, no matter what became of the balance of that archipelago.

It was also stated that the question of indemnity had entered into the negotiations at Paris, and I had the temerity to ask in open session, when there were three members of that commission in the Senate, whether these statements were true or not. The President pro tempore of the Senate, one of the commissioners to Paris, responded most emphatically that the President had said nothing about indemnity, but that he had instructed the commissioners to take Luzon; and there the discussion ended. Now, it seems to me that the friends of the Administration should desire the whole of that correspondence to be placed before the American people.

As the matter now stands, the President of the United States first instructed the commissioners before they left Washington to acquire or take the island of Luzon. Afterwards the President—and I am not indulging in hypercriticism—stated repeatedly in his Western tour that he was an instrument of Providence, or words to that effect, and that the whole of the archipelago fell as a ripe apple into the lap of the United States, and what are we to do with it? Were we, he said, to abandon the archipelago to become the prey of some foreign power; were we to leave these people to anarchy and bloodshed and rapine, or were we to accept, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] so eloquently said the other day, the office of trustee under God to lift these people to a higher plane of civilization? If it be true that the President was willing to take Luzon, and so instructed his commissioners, what was to become of the balance of that archipelago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). The Senator from Missouri will suspend for a moment at least. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish, before the Senator from Missouri goes on, to have it understood that the resolutions we are now on do not go to the Calendar. I should like to ask that they hold their place without prejudice, as before. I hope some time to get them passed, because, although the Senators who are so anxious for more information seem indisposed to let resolutions asking for some to go through, I am in hopes they may pass, and so I do not want them to lose their place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator that it will be necessary to take some action to prevent their going to the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Then I ask unanimous consent, as I have done before, that the resolutions may not lose their place, but may come up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolutions do not lose their place; in other words, that they do not go to the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. That they go over, as before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That they stand in the same position they occupied prior to the arrival of the hour of 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will please permit the Chair to ask if there is objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may have an opportunity to complete his observations.

Mr. ALDRICH. If he desires to proceed further now. That is the question I was about to ask.

Mr. ALLISON. If he desires to do so to-day; or does he prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. VEST. I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa. I desire to detain the Senate but a moment longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may be allowed to complete his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I hardly know in what language to characterize this continued imputation that there are friends of Aguinaldo upon this floor, giving aid and comfort to the enemies of our country. I have already characterized that charge as I think it deserves; but to show its manifest injustice to those of us who opposed that treaty I call attention to the fact that none of us has ever made any statement upon this floor so strong as that made by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] in public session during the last Congress. I take it for granted that no man will question the loyalty of the senior Senator from New Jersey, a gallant soldier, who fought in the civil war and was tendered the commission of major-general during the Spanish war. I take it for granted no man living will question his loyalty to this country or to the principles of the Republican party; but the senior Senator from New Jersey, from his place in open session, declared that after the destruction of the Spanish fleet in the bay of Manila he had gone to the President and said—I quote his own language—"For God's sake, Mr. President, withdraw Dewey and let these islands alone." Was he an enemy to his country and a friend to Aguinaldo? And yet what could have been stronger than this expression of opinion to the President of the United States that the policy he was now pursuing should be then and there abandoned?

As the Congressional record stands to-day, what is the position of the President of the United States? It appears that he directed the commissioners to take one island, and, as a matter of course, to leave the others to their fate, whatever it might be. It appears also from the public utterances of the President and his friends that after abandoning this policy of taking but one island he has stated repeatedly, and they have stated, that it was the act of Providence, and it would have been a crime to leave any portion of the people of the Philippines to the uncertain fate that awaited them in the future.

Mr. President, this whole Philippine question is in a nebulous and cloudy condition that befores the public mind and the councils even of the leaders of public opinion in the dominant party in this country to-day. We adopted at the last session what is known as the McEnery resolution. In the McEnery resolution we declared that the Philippines should never become States of this Union and the people of the Philippines should not be citizens of the United States; but that the United States would give them self-government. That resolution was adopted and sent to the House of Representatives, and it was certainly the expression of opinion, emphatic and distinct, upon the part of the Senate of the United States.

Now, to-day where stand the men who are responsible for the adoption of this treaty? A resolution is offered by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] which declares that we are to take the Philippines and hold them forever as property of the United States. What has become of the declaration in the McEnery resolution for self-government to the Philippines? Is it abandoned? Do those who control to-day the destinies of this country mean to hold those islands and the people thereof without regard to the wishes of the inhabitants of the islands and without regard to the solemn declaration made by the Senate of the United States that they are never to become States of the Union nor their people citizens, but should have self-government?

But, Mr. President, I am almost afraid to say so much in view of the sensitive condition that seems to prevail here and throughout the country as to any declaration in regard to the Philippine Islands or their future. I disclaim now positively any intention to indulge in any line of remarks that may encourage opposition to the authority of the United States anywhere. But as a Senator of the United States, representing in part a sovereign State, I deny the right of any man in this Chamber or out of it to muzzle me and prevent an honest expression of opinion in regard to the policy of this country, for fear that I may be denominated a traitor and a public enemy.

I am sorry our foreign relations are in the condition we find them to-day, and yet all the world knows that so far we have been most unfortunate. We have the bubonic plague added to the leprosy in Hawaii, starvation in Puerto Rico, unrest and disquiet in Cuba, and a war of indefinite length, so far as human foresight is concerned, in the Philippines. Is it treason to make this statement, or shall we who opposed the Paris treaty and predicted the disasters that have come and will come be so cowardly and recreant to the trust reposed in us by a free people as to sit here silent for fear of a vitriolic denunciation on the other side and decline to discharge our duty as the fearless representatives of a great people?

It is said that this war must continue. I have no argument to make on that question. I said publicly here, after the treaty against my will and vote was confirmed, that to pass resolutions was like sending for a first-class physician after the patient was dead. When that treaty was ratified by the Senate of the United States certain logical results ensued, known to every Senator here before he cast his vote, because there was a battle in the Philippines, in front of Manila, between Aguinaldo and our forces on Saturday, and we voted upon that treaty on Tuesday. Every man who voted for it knew then that he voted for a war. Every Senator knew then, as he knows now, that we were paying $20,000,000 for a war in the archipelago, the end of which might come in a month and might not come in ten years.

I do not say this in order to reopen that discussion as to the treaty which was approved by the Senate. I simply put before the Senate and the country this proposition: Are we to remain silent, refraining even from ordinary criticism as to the conduct of the war, for fear that we are to be denounced as the allies of Aguinaldo and opposed to the authority of our country?

Mr. President, I have nothing else to say, and I am very sure that what I have said will be misconstrued, because it seems to be the policy in certain quarters to brand every man who does not give his unqualified assent to all that is done in this Philippine war as unworthy the confidence of the public. That is all.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate at this time to present a few thoughts on the merits of the amendment introduced by me to the currency bill for the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks of issue.

Mr. President, it is claimed by the Senator from Rhode Island in his speech that this bill has been framed for the purpose of placing all of our money upon a sound basis and so remedying the defects of our present national banking system that the smaller places may have the benefits of whatever good may flow out of the national banking law. It is useless at this time for me to discuss the question of the comparative merits of gold and silver as money metals. It is useless for me to discuss the merits of the present national-bank system.

AN EXISTING DEFECT ADMITTED.

The Republicans in the Senate are convinced that the present national-bank law is defective, in that it does not adequately circulate money in the smaller places, or they would never have introduced this bill. There must be a recognized evil, or they would not seek to provide a remedy. They propose in their bill to remedy the situation by giving us more banks under the national banking law, and to allow those banks to issue a little larger circulation. This remedy might give us more hope were it not for the fact that in many sections of the United States the national banking business has never paid and can not pay under the present national banking law. The avenues of profit through which the national banks are allowed to derive their sustenance do not exist to a sufficient extent in many localities of the United States to make them profitable. In the New England States and the Eastern States, where the forms of securities in which national banks can deal constitute a considerable proportion of the property of the people, these banks can make money. In the West and South, where such securities form but a small portion of the business assets, national banks are not profitable.

NATIONAL BANKS INADEQUATE IN AGRICULTURAL SECTIONS.

Mr. President, no legislation can enable these banks in such localities to make money without changing the form of property with which they are allowed to deal or the nature of the assets the people possess. Under the present banking law, as shown by the last statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, 47 per cent of the national banks in the Western States have either failed or gone into liquidation. With this record before the business men, what inducement can be held out for the establishment of new banks? The chances are even that the bank will go out of existence, and far more than even that, it will fail to make money. In the Pacific States, according to the same authority, 44 per cent of the national banks organized have failed or gone into liquidation. In the Middle States 36 per cent of the banks organized under the national-banking law have failed or gone into liquidation. In the Southern States 31 per cent of the banks organized under the national-banking law have either failed or gone into liquidation. In the Eastern States 20 per cent have failed, and in the New England States only 16 per cent.

Mr. President, the success of the national banks depends not upon the number of the banks nor their distribution, but upon the character of the investments in the communities in which these banks do business. They have not paid in the South or West, and they will not pay in the South or West. More banks will only create a greater competition for a kind of business that now has simply a bare existence, and will make it harder for any national bank to continue in existence. The multiplication of banks will end only in an increase of bank failures in the sections to which national banks are not adapted.

Mr. President, it matters not what our circulating medium may be per capita if that circulating medium is not equally distributed throughout the country. If there is $25 per capita, so distributed that it is $150 in New York and $15 in South Carolina, the business of the East will continue to be done at the expense of other sections of the country, which is not only unjust but denotes a very unhealthy condition of the body politic. It has been truthfully said that the circulating medium constitutes the blood of the financial body; the banks are the arteries through which it is distributed, and the Federal Government is the heart, the duty of which it is to pump the blood into all parts of the body. In the physical body, if certain arteries have too much blood and others too little, the result is sickness, paralysis, and death. That is just the trouble to-day with our financial system.

Some of the arteries are overcharged with blood, while others have too little; hence certain parts of the body suffer from defective circulation. The present bill is the prescription for this trouble. We are in consultation as to whether or not this remedy is proper and sufficient. It provides for more arteries in the parts of the body which now suffer from lack of circulation, but does not provide for introducing the blood into those arteries. The trouble is not that we have not enough arteries, but that the arteries we now have are not acting properly from want of nourishment.

TANGIBLE PROPERTY BETTER SECURITY THAN FLUCTUATING VALUES.

Mr. President, my amendment is for the purpose of providing new blood and not new arteries. The people of the South have cotton, rice, and sugar. They do not have stocks and bonds. The people of the West have cattle, grain, and minerals. They do not have stocks and bonds.

We want some way in which we can use our cotton and sugar, their cattle and grain, for the purpose of securing a circulating medium with which to do business. The people of the East have stocks and bonds. They now have a way to secure the necessary circulating medium. More banks may benefit them. More national banks will not benefit us, because we do not own the kind of property upon which the national banks do business. The East has practically a monopoly of that class of property, and consequently when the Southern banks want money with which to move and handle the cotton crop they must go East to get it. When the Western bankers want to move the cattle or the grain, they go East to get the money. The circulating medium is in the East, and the West and South, when they require fresh blood, have to call upon the East for it, and within twelve months it is all congested in the East again.

Mr. President, the tax books of the South and of the West show that the people of those sections are not insolvent; they are wealthy. They are not lacking in property; they are not lacking in business ability; they are not lacking in enterprise; they produce three-fourths of the products of the United States, and yet they have less money than any other sections.

The last statement of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the banks in the Eastern States held $164,341,336 of stocks and securities. Those of the Southern States held $16,849,465; those of the Western States held $10,995,759. The banks of the Eastern States held more than one-half of all the stocks and securities in the United States.

ASSETS OF INDUSTRIAL VS. SPECULATIVE SECTIONS.

The same statement shows that the banks of the Southern States had overdrafts amounting to $3,513,646, while those of the Eastern States had only $1,494,784. These overdrafts were of perfectly solvent men or the bank examiner would not have approved them. It shows conclusively that the Southern people, with all their wealth, did not have enough money with which to do business. The same statement shows that the Eastern banks had of individual deposits $1,077,387,290. At the same time the Southern States had upon deposit $181,377,705, thus showing a little over six times the amount of deposits in the Eastern States that there were in the Southern States. And yet the assessed valuation of property in the Eastern States was $3,088,579,925, while in the Southern States it was $4,089,433,349. In other words, while the people of the East had more than six times the amount of cash possessed by the people of the South, they had less than twice as much wealth. The circulating medium in the East must therefore be three times as great in proportion to the property as the circulating medium in the South. The population of the Eastern States, according to the census of 1890, was 14,142,075, while the population of the Southern States was 18,327,704.

The 14,000,000 in the East had six times as much money in the banks as had the 18,000,000 people in the South, yet the products of the South far exceeded those of the Eastern States. The disproportion was not caused by the poverty of the South, as is shown by the assessed valuation of the two sections. The Eastern States had about one-half of the deposits of the entire United States, another fact that strikes me most forcibly in this connection. The total deposits were $2,450,725,595, while the Treasury statement of the same date shows that there was in existence of all forms of money in the United States at that time but $1,985,930,964, thus showing on deposit in the banks $600,000,000 more than there was in existence, not counting the reserve held by the banks. This shows that the credits to the depositors largely consisted of other forms of money than the actual cash. It is to the fact that the banks of the East do business largely with paper that this great disparity in the circulating medium is due.

For seventy-five years this trouble did not exist. There were some mistakes made by allowing loose wildcat banking, but the legitimate State bank institutions were more sound than are the national banks to-day. Those State banks still exist, but by reason of the 10 per cent tax upon their circulation they are not allowed to issue notes. The tax is greater than the interest they would receive. The State banks now make money by borrowing money in New York and loaning it out at an increased rate of interest. This rate of interest is necessarily so high as to handicap all development. A concern can not be established in South Carolina or Georgia and compete upon equal terms with another concern which pays only one-half the rate of interest in one of the other States.

If State banks under proper State restrictions were allowed to issue circulation the rates of interest would be reduced one-half, money would be plentiful, and the South and West would have enough circulating medium to develop their wonderful resources. The South is just entering upon a wonderful era of progress and development. We are handicapped by scarcity of money and high interest rates. Her people want to use their assets in upbuilding their country. This they are not allowed to do. They have the values and all else that constitute the means with which to accomplish their object except a cash medium. They want this tax upon the circulation of State banks repealed, because they want an actual circulating form of money, and they have just as much confidence in money which is based upon actual values in wheat, corn, cattle, or cotton as they have in a money based upon credit, as is the money which is used in the Eastern States and placed to the credit of depositors by the banks as cash.

They believe that cotton in sight is just as good a basis for money as problematical earnings of a railroad company. They are not after any wild-cat speculation; they simply want a legitimate medium of exchange. They have discovered by sad experience that the circulating medium is controlled by speculators. They remember the days of 1873, when Jay Cooke & Co., a perfectly solvent concern, made a temporary assignment, which caused a panic from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Lakes to the Gulf, and stagnated all business, because the bonds of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company suffered a slump in the market. They have observed the intimate relations which exist between the price of speculative stocks and the scarcity or plenty of the circulating medium. They don't want a money that is plentiful when stocks are high and scarce when stocks are low, or vice versa. They are not interested in stocks. They want to raise corn and wheat and cotton; they want to cut timber; they want to dig coal. They want the money that is based upon these actual values. They are satisfied with the money of the United States, including that of the national banks, because they believe it is based upon sound principle and have faith in the Government. But experience has shown them that they can not get that money except through the hands of those interested in stocks and dependent upon the fluctuations of the stock market. They do not want their money to fluctuate that way. Here is a bank with tangible property. They own corn and wheat and cotton; they own timber and coal. The States have required them to give security. The man who holds one of their bills can go and look at the tangible property pledged for redemption of that bill. He knows the property is there, and he accepts without hesitation the security that is offered him. He knows when he takes it that the failure of a railroad company or a large corporation or a flurry in the stock market is not going to affect either the quantity or the value of the circulating medium. He knows that if he has a legitimate enterprise he can obtain the money necessary to carry it on. He knows that if he has not a legitimate enterprise he don't get any money from his neighbors, who know all about him and his scheme. The speculator would get his money in New York, as he does now. The legitimate business man would get his money at home. The State-bank circulation would not interfere with the national-bank circulation, but would be a valuable auxiliary to it.

A DIRECT TAX AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

At the time this war measure of a tax upon State-bank circulation was passed the best constitutional lawyers believed that it was a direct tax and unconstitutional. The same arguments were used in favor of it that were used to support the income tax. The United States Supreme Court decided at that time in favor of the income tax, but the present court decided against it; and if the State-bank question were again brought before the Supreme Court, it is at least very doubtful if it would be upheld.

During the discussion of this bill in the Senate its leading features were discussed by Senator Collamer, of Vermont, in the following manner; and when it is remembered that Senator Collamer was a leading New England Republican, we are impressed with the old adage that "time brings great changes."

To induce people to take $300,000,000 of stock on interest, set up these banks, put out their circulation as a national currency, and we guarantee its payment. Wherein is that any better than the paper we have got out now? I will ask the gentlemen to put that question to themselves, is it any better? What is it founded on? United States credit, United States stocks. Whom do the bill holders look to for final redemption? The United States Treasury we say will redeem them; the system has no other foundation; all these fictitious contrivances about the responsibility of the individual stockholders amount to just nothing at all.

As to the provision retaining 25 per cent of their circulation, they can put that into their own pockets whenever they please, and there is nobody to question them about it. It is simply and singly founded upon the public responsibility, and, indeed, the honorable Senator from Ohio deems that to be its great feature of excellence. Instead of circulating that amount of our own currency upon our own responsibility and paying nothing, we are to hire them to circulate that amount of our currency and pay them $12,000,000 a year in gold for doing it. Yankee as I am, I am unable to perceive how it is possible that that can be a good trade for us, or how any shrewd man would think of entering into an agreement of that kind.

These means forced the people of this country to accept the debts of the nation with but 45 cents on the dollar as security for their circulating medium in the place of actual property with double the value of the circulating notes.

It absolutely destroyed the business and property rights of one class of citizens in order to build up and enforce the business and profits of another class.

A SAFE PROPOSITION.

Let each State control its own banking system. Let its legislature determine what kind of security shall be held and how much currency can be issued and what kind of money it shall be redeemed in. Such action will furnish a domestic currency for the use of the people of that State among themselves.

They only seek to have a medium for their own business. They do not care to have a currency that will go outside of their State. The object is not to have it go away from home. Whatever other pretenses may be made, this means will be antagonized by only one class of people, the money-owning and consequently the money-lending class, since it stands for the best interests and welfare of all others.

Gen. M. C. Butler, who formerly represented in this body the State which I in part now represent, used the following strong language recently in an open letter to a friend in South Carolina:

I regard the repeal of the 10 per cent tax of far more value to the welfare of the great masses of the people than the free coinage of silver. The present evil in our monetary system is the inadequacy in the volume of currency and the inequality of its distribution—the latter the greater of the two evils. This inequality of distribution would be corrected if we could have local State banks of issue, under proper safeguards, and just so much currency would be put out by them as the local demands required. It has always struck me as very absurd to suppose that any State would or could permit "wildcat banking," which is about the only argument ever urged against State banks of issue. No State, under our modern methods of transacting business through quick correspondence by mail and wire and the vigilance of the commercial and business agencies, could tolerate loose or "wildcat banking" for forty-eight hours, and there is no good reason why State-bank currency could not be made as sound and safe as the present national-bank currency.

I have said the free coinage of silver would inevitably follow the reopening of State banks, and for this reason: These banks would absorb every dollar of coin, both gold and silver, as security for their circulation and to maintain whatever reserve the law might require. For domestic purposes, as a domestic currency, silver is to-day as good as gold. Silver only becomes embarrassing when transactions are had with foreign countries. Like gold, it passes only for its bullion value in foreign countries; but at home it is taken at par of its present weight and fineness. I say, therefore, for all domestic purposes, silver is as good as gold, and there is no reason why it should not be admitted to free coinage and used by local banks as a redemption and reserve fund.

This scheme of circulation does not require the issuance of a single bond or the payment of a dollar by the United States Treasury in interest. The bonds issued during President Cleveland's Administration amounted to $263,315,400. There was received for the bonds the sum of $293,454,286.74. The quotation of Fiske & Robinson shows that these bonds are worth to-day in the market $349,753,866. This makes a profit to the banks of $36,299,580. The last issue of bonds are now quoted at $1.10, which gives the banks a profit of $19,800,000 upon the issue. The bonds are now quoted in New York at $1.10, at which figure the income is only 14 per cent. They meet with ready sale, which shows that the Government can borrow money at that figure and that the banks who receive $6,000,000 a year make a net profit of $2,500,000 a year upon the last issue of bonds alone. Since 1892 the increase in interest paid annually by the United States has been $17,000,000. It is now proposed to increase it still further.

These enormous sums are direct subsidies to the Eastern banks.

The total indebtedness of the United States is less than it was in 1892, while the interest charged is over 70 per cent greater.

During President Harrison's Administration the interest-bearing debt of the United States was $585,029,330. The noninterest-bearing debt was $1,000,648,999.37. In the Treasury statement of the public debt for the month of November, 1899, the interest-bearing debt has been increased to $1,037,049,690. The noninterest-bearing debt has been decreased to $388,048,760.16. The proposition in this currency bill is to wipe out this noninterest-bearing debt by replacing it with interest-bearing debt. The interest paid by the United States Government in 1893 was $22,893,883. The interest paid for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, was $29,896,925.02.

A GLARING DISCRIMINATION.

During the panic of 1893 it was impossible for the banks of the South to obtain money in New York with which to handle the cotton crop, and the banks of the West experienced the same difficulty as to the grain of that section. The banks of New York relieved the financial stringency there by the issuance of clearing-house certificates, and in this they were assisted by the United States Treasury. The banks of the South and the banks of the West immediately formed clearing-house associations and issued clearing-house certificates in regular form, as is shown by the one which I will now read to the Senate:

CLEARING-HOUSE CERTIFICATE OF THE ASSOCIATED BANKS OF ROCK HILL, S. C.

The First National Bank of Rock Hill, S. C. Cashier. The Savings Bank of Rock Hill, S. C. Cashier.	No. —
	SEPT. 4TH, 1893.
This certifies that the First National Bank of Rock Hill, S. C., and the Savings Bank of Rock Hill, S. C., have deposited with this committee securities in accordance with the proceedings of a meeting of the association, held September 4th, 1893, upon which this certificate is issued. This certificate will be received in payment of balances at the clearing house for the sum of 610
from any member of the Clearing-House Association.
On the surrender of this certificate by the depositing banks above named, the committee will endorse the amount as a payment on the obligation of said banks held by them and surrender a proportionate share of the collateral securities held therefor.
Countersigned by—	Committee.
Secretary.

The effect was electrical. Business improved at once and the crops began to move. The New York banks became alarmed. If the South and the West should become able to utilize their wealth in providing a means with which their communities could do business, the absolute control of the finances of the United States had passed out of the hands of the New York banks. Something had to be done and done at once. The Treasury, which looked with the utmost favor upon clearing-house certificates based upon stocks and bonds of uncertain and fluctuating value, promptly decided that clearing-house certificates with actual tangible values back of them constituted a State-bank circulation and were subject to taxation. If these were bank circulation, then the issues of the New York banks constituted bank circulation, and yet they were allowed to issue them without complying with the statute concerning the issue of circulation. This ruling of the Treasury riveted the bonds of financial slavery on the people of the South and West, and the sudden light of liberty was rudely extinguished.

I want at the proper time a vote upon the question as to whether or not the people of the South and West are to be allowed to use their wealth for the upbuilding of their sections or whether the discrimination is to be continued forever. I want a vote upon this question squarely and without any other question intervening. We have the property, we have the resources, and we want to know whether or not those who have less resources in the way of products and whose aggregate property is less than that of the South and West combined shall have all the money.

STATE BANKS CAN BE CONDUCTED IN HARMONY WITH PRESENT NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

I have no fight to make upon national-bank circulation but that circulation has been cornered. I want for my people a circulation that has not been cornered. I want it issued under the wisest restrictions of the State in which it is to circulate, but I do not want the element of speculation that has so disastrously affected the purchasing power of Federal money to have anything to do with this money which is to issue upon the basis of real values and tangible property. We wish to do business to the mutual advantage of all sections and upon terms of equality. We do not want to do business under the dictatorship of New York banks. We do not want for our section to have the present disproportion of circulating medium to the amount of wealth it possesses. We ask for nothing but exact and equal justice, and we will be content with nothing less.

REPAIR OF CABLES.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair requests the Senator from Minnesota to withhold the motion for a moment, that a message from the President may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, with accompanying papers. The message will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, with reference to the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasian and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain.

I recommend that, as an act of equity and comity, provision be made by the Congress for reimbursement to the company of the actual expenses incurred by it in the repair of the cables.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

Washington, January 16, 1900.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the message should be referred to the Committee on the Philippines and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection, the message, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines and printed. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 17, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 16, 1900.

CONSUL.

Robert W. McWade, of Pennsylvania, to be consul of the United States at Canton, China, vice Edward Bedloe, resigned.

SUPERVISOR OF CENSUS.

George M. French, of Hot Springs, Garland County, to be a supervisor of the Twelfth Census for the Fifth supervisor's district of Arkansas.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF VOTES.

Mr. LYBRAND. On the motion yesterday to recommit the bill H. R. 5297, I voted "no." I wish to change my vote to "present."

The SPEAKER. That can not be done, but the gentleman's statement will stand.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. On the roll call yesterday I am recorded as voting "no." I was paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. GRIGGS, and should have voted "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will stand as approved.

There was no objection.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD of January 4. On page 666, in the second column, I am made to declare that the number of cattle in this country in 1892 was ten millions more than in 1897. An examination of the stenographic report shows that I said seven millions more. My own recollection is distinct on that point, because I know that was the shortage.

How this mistake occurred I will not undertake to say, for I do not know whether it was a careless revision of the stenographic report, or whether it occurred in the Printing Office. At any rate, I am not willing to allow that kind of a discrepancy to remain in the RECORD without a correction. I should not have troubled the House to correct it, and intended simply to make the correction in the permanent RECORD, but when I went to the Printing Office to do this I found that the permanent RECORD had already been made up, and there was nothing left for me except to incorporate in the RECORD of to-day this statement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a third report on the investigations of the agricultural capabilities of Alaska for the year 1899, in accordance with the acts of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1899, and June 30, 1900.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 15, 1900.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

USELESS PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced as House members of the Joint Committee on the Disposal of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, Messrs. MINOR of Wisconsin and COCHRAN of Missouri.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Pending that, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what time he is willing to allow for general debate? Should not that be fixed in the House?

Mr. CANNON. I think it just as well to fix it now, if we can, by agreement, if the Chair will for a moment suspend the putting of the question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope the gentleman is willing to let general debate proceed until the close of to-day's session, which will be only about four hours, and take the bill up in the morning under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the gentleman to suggest that we have general debate to-day, and that it be closed to-day, and that to-morrow the bill be discussed under the five-minute rule?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is my suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. That is, on the deficiency bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I am quite content. I think that is fair, and I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That the time be evenly divided between the two sides of the House?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this day be devoted to general debate. Does the Chair state the question correctly, "this day?"

Mr. CANNON. "This day."

The SPEAKER. That this day be devoted to the general debate on the appropriation bill to be considered, the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. That general debate close with this day's session, and then the bill to be taken up by the committee, of course, under the ordinary five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole

House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I can say in a very few moments all I desire to say by way of explanation of this bill. If gentlemen will consult the report, No. 43, they will find, substantially, an explanation of the same. The bill provides for the public service, substantially, for the remainder of this fiscal year, covering what is believed to be all urgent items, and many items that are not urgent, but will be required before the expiration of the fiscal year. On the first page of the report gentlemen will find items covering $8,525,000 in the aggregate. Appropriations for these items are recommended. In addition to the $8,500,000 of direct appropriations, the bill authorizes the reappropriations, or extensions, during the fiscal year 1900, of the balance remaining unexpended on July 1, 1899, of appropriations made for the military and naval establishments for the fiscal year ending 1899 and 1899.

On the second page of the report these items are stated, aggregating $45,753,000, in round numbers, for the military establishment, and $1,850,000 for the naval establishment, making a total of $47,603,332.61 of reappropriations for the public service. Then follows a statement of the unexpended balances for the military and naval establishments for the fiscal year ending 1899 and 1899, aggregating $57,600,000, in round numbers. I believe that is all I desire to say. The bill has been prepared with much care, and there is no recommendation in it but what is believed to be necessary for the public service. There are some items in it that an urgent deficiency bill ordinarily does not carry. One I will call attention to are judgments of the Court of Claims, $3,123,000, in round numbers.

Ordinarily this item would come at the end of the fiscal year instead of at this time; but the judgments being final, the time for appeal having elapsed, your committee thought it was proper that the money should be appropriated. It is due to the citizen, by the judgment of the court of last resort, and ought to be paid.

Now, unless there is some question that some gentleman desires to ask touching the bill, I will yield the floor, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question respecting the item on page 739 in relation to the rural free delivery service, as to whether it is a deficiency or whether a part of it is a deficiency and the other is an additional appropriation asked for, and what motives, if he feels disposed to give them, prompted the committee to insert this item here?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentlemen will turn to page 39, they will find the following item about which the gentleman from California queries:

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $150,000: Provided, That in administering the service under this appropriation no deficiency shall be created therein.

Your committee gave very careful investigation touching this item, and I will say to the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that we gave it perhaps more careful investigation than we would have done from the fact that the general policy of the Post-Office Department, not only in legislation, but in appropriations as well, is considered primarily under the rules by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and we found on examination that for experimental rural free-delivery service, under the lead of the gentleman from California and his committee, there was appropriated for the service of this year in the Post-Office appropriation bill $300,000.

Now, it seems that this money has been largely expended and only half of the fiscal year has passed by; and, on inquiry, we found that unless an additional appropriation was made by Congress in a deficiency bill (and that is the proper place for it, if it is made), much of the service of rural free delivery that had been heretofore instituted or commenced would have to be discontinued before the end of the fiscal year; in other words, that the service had been so extended that it could not be continued as extended until the 1st day of July next without additional appropriation.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. So that the committee saw that it was absolutely necessary to recommend an additional appropriation for the continuance of this service for the remaining six months, or, in the event that Congress failed to do so, the Post-Office Department would have to discontinue a portion of the service already entered upon. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES. In what portion of the country, if any particular portion, is this rural delivery now in use?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In every State except three.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana says every State except three. I do not know; I did not inquire about that. I think it is quite generally in use throughout the country.

Mr. BROWN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. In reference to this appropriation of $150,000, I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that unless this appropriation should be made a number of free delivery service routes already instituted would have to be discontinued, or some statement substantially like that. Now, if that is a fact, I wish to ask whether the House correctly understood the gentleman or whether the $150,000 may be sufficient to continue the service already instituted and establish others? I ask that for the reason that the First Assistant Postmaster-General has frequently said to me that petitions which I have filed with him for the service in my Congressional district would be considered by him if Congress made appropriations to supply the deficiency. The matter is an exceedingly important one in my district.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, in reply to his question, that I had a telegram from the Post-Office Department bearing upon that matter, but one of the members of the committee has it, and it is not on the files at this moment.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have a detailed answer to the question by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Georgia has a telegram, and he may have it read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I desire that the telegram may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1900.

Hon. J. M. GRIGGS:

Replying to your inquiry about item for rural free delivery in urgent deficiency bill, I have to state if experimental service as it stands to-day is continued until June 30, 1900, it will require about $50,000 to prevent a deficiency on that date. Service is entirely experimental, and may be discontinued at will of Postmaster-General. If Congress finds it inadvisable to provide additional funds for service this year, it is intention of Department to reduce service sufficiently to keep expenditure on its account within appropriation of $90,000. To establish new service for which there are now on file in Department complete reports, including selection and bonding of carriers, it would require $50,000 more. Then, to comply with applications of members which are not yet fully reported upon by special agents, it would require still $90,000 additional. These amounts you will see make up item of $150,000 reported in urgent deficiency bill.

A. W. MACHEN, Superintendent.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Georgia for forwarding the telegram. The Committee on Appropriations upon yesterday had a similar telegram, and when you analyze it, it states that $50,000 of the $150,000 appropriated will continue the service in being; $50,000 will put the service upon routes that have been determined upon, and there will still be $50,000 for routes that have not been passed upon.

Now, I am frank to say, in reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], that this expenditure, or rather the manner of the expenditure, does not meet my approval, for the reason that under positive law the Executive in most cases, and this is one of them, has no power to expend money or create liabilities beyond the appropriations made by Congress.

Now, under the lead of your Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads $300,000 was appropriated, and that has been so expended and the service has been so placed that it will require $50,000 more than the $300,000 to continue that service to the 1st day of July next. So that Congress comes up against the proposition of either giving this money in whole or in part by the way of appropriation or discontinuing service that has been commenced. I do not believe that is a wise method of administration, to say the mildest thing about it I can say. I believe it is the duty of the Executive to cut the garment according to the legislative cloth that is furnished. It is the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, with the approval of the President, that make appropriations.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it is only fair to the Post-Office Department to say that they have not made any permanent arrangement for service. It is experimental, and they do not intend to exceed the amount appropriated. The whole thing is experimental, but it has been so satisfactory to the people of the country that it is being cried for all over the country and its extension demanded.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, in reply to the gentleman, without discussing at this time in the slightest degree the merits of the rural free delivery—I am not discussing its merits at all, but am discussing the situation to which the gentleman from California has asked my attention—I state again that $300,000 for experimental free delivery in the regular Post-Office appropriation bill was an increase of that much over the prior year.

Mr. LOUD. An increase of 100 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Just double the amount appropriated for the prior fiscal year. Now, then, I do say that the Post-Office Department has gone on experimenting with the rural free-delivery service actually existing throughout the country to that degree that unless Congress comes in and appropriates $50,000 more that experiment will have to be discontinued between this and the 1st day of next July. Perhaps that may be keeping the law in the letter, but it is violating the law in substance.

Wherever this service goes—wherever there is a threat of discontinuance next May—there comes a protest; and this is a representative government; and when the protest comes from our various districts, as was the case once before, touching letter-carrier service in our cities, where there was a similar condition, and protests came from chambers of commerce and from residents of those cities undersubstantially similar conditions to the present, Congress felt compelled to make the appropriation. That is to say, the Executive, departing from the substance of the law, had so conducted the public service as to create circumstances that Congress was practically coerced into making the appropriations, whether they thought them wise or not.

I do not believe that such a situation ought to exist. It is for the Congress of the United States to make appropriations. If they are not wisely made, Congress is responsible; if wisely made, Congress has the credit. The Constitution places the power in the hands of Congress, and, without discussing the merits of the rural free delivery, I have no language too strong in which to disapprove of this method of expenditure, however meritorious the service may be.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, to say that he protests against this expenditure of money, which has created a deficiency in the appropriation for rural free delivery, and that his proposition is that the Department ought to be limited to the exact amount carried by the general appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman misunderstands me. I say that under the law—well ascertained and of many years' standing—the Executive has no right to make a deficiency. Of course there are certain exceptions—for instance, in the expenditures for the Army and the Navy and the military establishment, and so on—but I am stating the rule as applied to this service and most other branches of the public service.

Now, I do say that under this appropriation there has been so large an expenditure that there is to be presented the alternative of a deficiency or a discontinuance of the service. Now, in my judgment, without regard to the merits of the free-delivery system, that action of the Executive Department was not proper.

Mr. POWERS. I notice that the gentleman is very careful not to say that this appropriation ought to be defeated.

Mr. CANNON. I have not said so; and I will say to the gentleman, first, it may be a meritorious service; second, I suspect I am exactly in the same condition as most members on the floor of this House. This service, I may say, has been begun, extending to different parts of the country, and already come remonstrances against the local discontinuance from this place and that place and the other place. Now, then, I say as a matter of general practice and particular practice that the Executive, under the law, keeping it, in substance, ought not to so administer the appropriations as to produce such a condition.

I might say further, that under these conditions the fact of the necessity of making this appropriation is evidenced by the action of the Committee on Appropriations, because they report favorably for the consideration of the House this item of $150,000.

Mr. POWERS. Then am I right in assuming that the honorable chairman of the committee, who guards the Treasury with so much jealousy, really thinks this appropriation ought, under the circumstances, to be made in order to meet the expectations of the people on the routes already in operation?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that I shall vote for this appropriation, as I did for the appropriation for letter carriers two or three years ago, when there was a threatened decrease of service unless Congress would come to the rescue.

But in doing this I will say, in answer to the honorable gentleman from California, I should fail to do my duty unless as strongly as I could, without regard to the merit of this service or any other service, I called attention in this respect to what I believe to be maladministration on the part of the Department.

Mr. BERRY. Does this appropriation contemplate the extension of this service to districts that do not now have it, or does it apply only to those where it already exists?

Mr. CANNON. Fifty thousand dollars is for the service already in existence. Fifty thousand dollars and a small sum additional is to pay for service favorably considered and which is an extension, and then there will remain $50,000 for other service that may be agreed upon between now and the 30th day of June.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question in regard to the extraordinary limitation following this appropriation. After the words "one hundred and fifty thousand dollars," in line 6, page 39, the language of the bill is as follows:

Provided, That in administering the service under this appropriation no deficiency shall be created—

Mr. CANNON. That is unusual.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I want to know whether that is usual or unusual and why it is applied to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON. Unusual.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then why should it be applied in this case?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to the gentleman that that question will come up if he sees proper to make a point of order on it, but I will say further to him now that that is the law to-day.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, then, why reassert it?

Mr. CANNON. I want to reassert it in this connection so as to show that the judgment of the House of Representatives is that, in the expenditure of this money, the law that is upon the statute books shall not be violated.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, now, if the gentleman will permit me, why should that limitation be made to apply specifically to the Post-Office Department in the administration of this particular branch of the public service?

Mr. CANNON. Because there has been a specific and a substantial violation of the law.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not believe there has been any violation of law. Experiments have been made at the request of members of Congress all over this country, and what has been done by the Post-Office Department, in my opinion, meets the approval of almost every man who has given it any thought or any attention, and will, in my judgment, be sustained by this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, there has not been established within my recollection a more popular branch of the public service than the rural free mail delivery for the farmers of the country. You have again and again created deficiencies in other branches of the Government. Why not do it freely in this instance when you are serving the great agricultural interests of the country, who are to-day being benefited by rural free mail delivery as they have been by no other expenditure of the Government? And I hope to see it extended to every farmer in the country. It is already self-supporting in many States and a complete success in Michigan. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to answer the gentleman from Michigan, at least in part—the gentleman to whom I always yield and who always when yielded to either clarifies the atmosphere or puts a searchlight upon the situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I suppose that depends on the point of view. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. He goes off and talks about the merits of the rural free delivery service and says that individual members of Congress have gone and insisted that the law shall be violated.

Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the American Congress. I have great respect for the House of Representatives, which is frequently stated, and believed by me, to be perhaps—no, not perhaps—to be the greatest popular assembly on earth. But it takes us all together to make the House of Representatives, sitting with the Speaker in the chair, the measures before the House, and a record of a majority vote to exercise the will of that great body.

And when it is exercised, I for one never have stood, nor will I ever stand, excusing a dodging of the issue by saying that here is a very nice service and a very popular service, and that the constitutional will of Congress shall be, and ought to be, nullified because the gentleman from Michigan believes that the service is so important that it should give way at his request.

Now, I want to state, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that this appropriation is favorably reported from the committee over which I have the honor to preside on this bill, which I reported by direction of that committee. I stand ready, and expect, as I did in the instance that he referred to before, to vote for it.

But I should be recreant to my duty as a Representative and as a member of this body if, in answering these questions, I did not call the attention of the House to what the administration of this fund had been.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. These various items of appropriation are all to make good deficiencies, as I understand.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. My friend from Iowa will see in a moment that "deficiencies" is merely a word to refer to additional appropriations, if the deficiency is a proper one.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then, I perhaps may simplify the matter by asking if there are several deficiencies provided for here?

Mr. CANNON. In some instances, where the law calls for the service, yes. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] knows that the military establishment and the naval establishment, in many of their departments, call for service without reference to appropriation and authorize an obligation. Now, there is something of that here. Then, again, take it in the Post-Office Department; the law calls for the transportation of the mails upon the railways. It may be there is not a deficiency on that in this bill; but there is frequently a deficiency there. Then in the item of the payment of postmasters' salaries; the law provides for the appointment of postmasters and provides for that service, and they would have a legal claim against the Government under the law, although there was no money appropriated. But for this service, and most of the public service, the law is that service shall be according to the appropriation, and that the performing of the service not within the appropriation is against the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; in all cases. Then wherever a deficiency is created there is a violation of the statute.

Mr. CANNON. Not in all cases, but in most cases.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I want to ask the gentleman why he has distinguished this particular case with a proviso? There is no proviso, such as is attached to this provision, attached to any other provision in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, as I said before—and he could not have been giving me his full attention at that time—

Mr. HEPBURN. No; it was the confusion. I always listen to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). That this is the only appropriation upon this bill where a service has been undertaken that was not provided for by appropriations or by law; and having favorably reported this appropriation notwithstanding that fact, the Committee on Appropriations felt that it was their duty to report the proviso to the House, so that with the appropriation might go the protest.

Now, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to unite with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in saying that the subcommittee in framing this bill have excluded everything that was not clearly and practically a deficiency, and an urgent one, with one or two exceptions.

It is true that the bill carries quite a large sum of money for an urgent deficiency bill—$56,000,000 and more. I want to say in regard to the matter that has been under discussion for the last thirty minutes that perhaps this House is not aware of the fact that the Post-Office Department went to the proper committee last winter—I mean the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads—and asked for this identical amount of money, specifying that they would have to have $150,000 more. They were notified by that committee that they were too late.

Mr. LOUD. Where does the gentleman find that? I should like to see it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I got it from a member of the committee, who sits on my left [Mr. GRIGGS]. They were told that there was no time. I do not know whether there was a disposition on the part of that committee to grant the appropriation or not. I am not questioning that.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield right there, as there may be a question of fact? Does not the gentleman very well know that there can be no request for an appropriation unless it be made in an official manner, certified from the Secretary of the Treasury or, if made subsequent to that certification, by an official letter from the Postmaster-General?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am very well aware of that.

Mr. LOUD. And nothing of that kind exists in this case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Technically, perhaps, you are right.

Mr. LOUD. No; truthfully I am right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Practically, perhaps, my information is correct. I understand the fact, Mr. Chairman, that unless an estimate is made and comes down through the formal channels, it can not be entertained by any Appropriation Committee. I understand that.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment or two?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have been present in the House only a few days during this session, but this morning, when this matter came to my attention, I went to the Post-Office Department and made inquiry with reference to it. I was there informed by the First Assistant Postmaster-General that a request had been made by the Post-Office Department of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report a bill carrying this extra $150,000; that he was informed that it could not at this session of Congress be acted upon by the Post-Office Committee, because under the rule this committee could only recommend appropriations during this Congress for the next fiscal year. Therefore it went from that Committee to the Committee on Appropriations, not because a deficiency already existed, but because a deficiency was in prospect provided this service was carried out as contemplated by the Post-Office Department, and the request was made of the Committee on Appropriations of the House to make an appropriation of this $150,000.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman refers simply to this appropriation, which is correct.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. They did come to our committee, and asked us to appropriate simply this $150,000.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] said that last year they came before our committee and stated that it would be necessary to appropriate $450,000 for this service, which is not true.

Mr. GRIGGS. I made an effort during the remarks of my colleague [Mr. LIVINGSTON], who clearly misapprehended me, to correct that statement, but he did not hear me, and therefore I am compelled, in self-defense, to put the matter correctly before the House.

Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why this proviso that no other deficiency shall occur during this fiscal year should be put in this bill on this particular item. I can not understand why, with deficiencies in every department, with other deficiencies probably in the Post-Office Department, this particular item, in which so many of the people in the rural districts of the United States are interested, should be made subject to this proviso when it is not applied elsewhere.

It is a reflection on the Department. It is a restriction upon the administration of this particular law and this very appropriation by the Post-Office Department. It is a harsh criticism and wholly undeserved. It is practically an announcement to the First Assistant Postmaster-General, "You have willfully violated the law, and we therefore propose to put a check on your future conduct in this respect." Mr. Chairman, there is no deficiency in that service; it is not a deficiency at all. This service is wholly experimental. They have $300,000 with which to experiment upon it this year. They could have spent that in thirty days if in the opinion of the Postmaster-General it was proper to be so expended and experimented with for only thirty days. He saw fit to extend the experiment further, and the Department has experimented until the money appropriated will last only until the middle of May.

Now, then, unless we do appropriate it now, unless this item stands in this bill, then from the 15th of May the service may be discontinued in order to confine the expenditures to the appropriation already made. No gentleman wants that. The Department has violated no law. The Postmaster-General could discontinue the entire service at his will: he could have spent it all by the 1st day of January, or he could spend it by the 1st day of February or any other date during this year. Therefore there has been no violation of law on his part, and it does not seem to me proper, Mr. Chairman, to cast a reflection upon the efficient administration of that official.

If this bill is as meritorious in every item as this item is meritorious, I would not hesitate to say that it is the best bill ever presented in the House of Representatives. I would not hesitate to say that if every item is as meritorious as that, it is an absolutely perfect bill, and the able gentleman who conducts the office of First Assistant Postmaster-General ought to be commended rather than criticised for his action. [Applause.] I shall not take up the time of the House to read again the telegram received by me from Mr. Machen, superintendent of free delivery, relating to this subject, which was read to the House in the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I shall insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It fully, candidly, and completely answers, to my mind, any objections offered to the small sum proposed to be appropriated in the interest of the great farming class of our people. I thank my colleague for the time so generously given me.

Hon. J. M. GRIGGS:

Replying to your inquiry about the item for rural free delivery in urgent deficiency bill, I have to state, if experimental service as it stands to-day is continued until June 30, 1900, it will require about $50,000 to prevent a deficiency on that date. The service is entirely experimental, and may be discontinued at will of Postmaster-General. If Congress finds it inadvisable to provide additional funds for service this year, it is the intention of the Department to reduce service sufficiently to keep expenditure on its account within the appropriation of $300,000. To establish new service, for which there are now on file in the Department complete reports, including selection and bonding of carriers, it would require $50,000 more. Then, to comply with applications of members which are not yet fully reported upon by special agents, it would require still $50,000 additional. These amounts, you will see, make up the item of $150,000 reported in urgent deficiency bill.

A. W. MACHEN, Superintendent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say that perhaps the House does not understand this appropriation of $150,000 and this experimental work being done by the Department. I thank my colleague for the explanation that he has offered. I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that it has been demonstrated beyond the question of a doubt in many instances already by these experiments that it is a cheaper service to the Government than the star route; and I want to say if the Post-Office Department is not interfered with by Congress it will settle that fact beyond the question of a doubt—that we could take down every fourth-class post-office in the United States and save money by it. There is an experiment being made to-day in the State of Maryland, bounded by the county lines, one entire county, for this particular purpose of settling the question of whether it is not economy to put this in the place of the star-route service.

The gentleman in charge of this bill says this is a representative government, and I want to repeat what my colleague intimated a moment ago—there is nothing in this bill, and nothing will come in any other bill, that comes nearer to your constituency and mine, outside of the large cities and towns, than this item. If the wealthy, the business part of the world, as denominated in this our day and time, are to have their mail dumped into their office or into their laps from two to five times a day, the rural people of this country are asking themselves the question, What can we get in the way of amendments in the matter of facilities for more frequent mail, more certain mail, all through this country of ours?

As evidence, Mr. Chairman, that it is popular not only to Congressmen but to the people that they represent, there are to-day 800 reports on examinations settled and waiting action now in the Department. There are coming in every day from ten to fifteen for action. In some instances where the experiment has been made, where the fourth-class post-office has been dismantled and this rural free delivery put in place of it, from 20 to 50 per cent has been saved. It is true the instances given here in the hearings are of some of the large fourth-class offices—in one instance the postmaster got $1,000—and perhaps that is not a fair test; but the Maryland experiment now being carried on by the Government will be a fair test, including one entire county.

You will find from the hearings, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this question was asked Mr. Machen of this free rural delivery: "What was the increase in mail wherever this rural-delivery practice had obtained?" He said from 20 to 50 per cent increase in mail. Therefore, it is one of the most potent educational facilities that Congress could put abroad in this country, for a man who lives in the country, remote from the towns and cities, by this system is enabled to read the daily papers, and if the mail increases as it has, from 20 to 50 per cent, with this short experiment, what will it be ten, twenty, or thirty years from now, when it obtains fully? I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Chairman, that it never will down. You may circumscribe it and limit it by the amendment to this appropriation or by this action, which is subject to the point of order, and must go out if the point is made, being new legislation. You may hedge it as you please, the people of this country—I mean the rural people of this country—intend to have it, they will have it, and ought to have it.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague from Georgia has made one point very clear—that it is not a deficiency in the ordinary sense of a deficiency. I will agree with the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Iowa, this limitation ought not to be put in here unless it is placed in every other appropriation bill.

I agree with the chairman of the committee that the Department for which appropriation is made ought to keep within the limit. There is no question about that. But it is the practice in all the Departments to spend the money outside of the appropriation and then come back to Congress and ask for a deficiency. Ever since I have been connected with this House that has been the practice. I am voting for this new legislation in this bill with the distinct understanding that it must go in all the other appropriation bills from every committee that appropriates money in this House. It is not right to make this an exception.

One more thought, and I am through. The criticism against the Department has been pretty severe. Why did they go out and involve a deficiency here of $150,000? Why, gentlemen, it was an experiment, purely and simply an experiment; and in cutting the cloth, as the chairman states it, it was impossible in a new and undeveloped work to cut that cloth exactly according to the appropriation. They took on, at the pressing instance of Congressmen here from all over the country, more work than could be completed within the appropriation. This must be the case until the experiment is settled and there comes a business proposition from a practical standpoint.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not deem this system past the experimental stage?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do. I want to say that there is not over two instances now in the Department where the experiments have been made, scattered as they have been in sparsely settled sections, that has not proven a decided and unquestioned success.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is not the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia held also by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, that it has passed its experimental stage?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is. I said a moment ago that it was no longer an experiment; that the people of this country understood it, and, as an evidence of it, there were 800 cases awaiting action to-day. I do not believe that these cases have been prepared by interested parties. The people have simply become informed of this system and think it is preferable to the old, and they are clamoring for it, and they will have it, and have it at your hands and my hands, and we may just as well face the fact. I want to say again, for one I am satisfied that it will not be more expensive, but less expensive, than the present star-route system and far more satisfactory.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me an interruption?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Is it contemplated that this shall be universal all over the United States?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the intention.

Mr. BERRY. If successful it is to be instituted all over the country?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me an interruption? I understood the gentleman to say that there had been a large increase, 50 per cent, I think he said. I want to know whether that increase is in the revenue of the Post-Office Department or in the amount of second-class mail matter that it carries.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is not second-class mail matter. It is not revenue. It is mail matter that usually goes through on the star-route system.

Mr. HEPBURN. In what part of the four classes has this increase been noticed? Is it in the first or second class?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not think the committee had any information on that line.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to know if the gentleman can give the House some idea of the cost of the service.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We ascertained this fact, that it is not so costly as the free delivery in the small towns and villages. It is not so costly as that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me, I desire to call attention—

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In a moment. I think this statement will answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa, that it is self-sustaining wherever it has been properly and economically instituted. Wherever it has been in operation six months it has been self-sustaining. Now, let me suggest how it works. A country boy from the farm, 16 years old, is hired on a circuit of 20 or 30 miles. He is given $400. He furnishes his own horse and his own buggy and his father perhaps raises the corn fodder and the hay that feeds the horse. You can see how it is a cheap system. Not only that, but it brings in relations to the Government a class of people that needs to get nearer to the flag and to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me, I desire to read, for the information of the House, six or seven lines from the report of First Assistant Postmaster-General Heath upon this subject, which will answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

He says:

It will thus be seen that with an additional expenditure of $150,000 rural free delivery has been extended to nearly 180,000 persons, at an annual cost of about 84 cents per capita. No account is taken in this estimate of the great increase of postal receipts (averaging from 50 to 75 per cent) which always follows the establishment of rural delivery, nor is any reduction made for the cost of fourth-class post-offices and star routes, practically superseded by the new service, which have been or might be discontinued.

This report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General gives us the maximum cost—it is far from being the minimum cost of that service—it fixes the maximum in this experimental stage at 84 cents per capita. No account was taken at all of the large increase in receipts from rural free delivery by the Post-Office Department. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a detailed report of the experimental service that has been made at Grand Rapids, Mich., in my district. I am surprised and gratified at the progress that has been made in that service. The mail matter distributed to the farmers on these routes has increased almost 100 per cent, in this experimental stage, since it was started, the best possible mail facilities being enjoyed by the agricultural class of our community. They get their daily mail and their daily newspapers with commendable promptness and regularity.

This is certainly a service that we owe the farmer; it keeps him in touch with the market, and commends itself to every man who has given any thought or attention to the subject; and rather than blame or criticize the Post-Office officials for their enterprise in putting this service into effect, they ought to be complimented for it, and, indeed, I believe they will be by a large appropriation when the general Post-Office bill comes up.

And, sir, I resent the insinuation of the gentleman from Illinois that I would, for one moment, advocate the violation of any law. On the contrary, sir, I would advise keeping within the law. I do not concede that any law has been violated, and, therefore, I have been ready and willing to aid in the establishment of this service in my district and State, and have been glad to learn that the people appreciate it and stand ready to sustain it. The Post-Office Department has never been administered with greater ability than now. The officials, from the highest to the lowest, are accommodating, vigilant, progressive, and public spirited, and deserve the confidence of Congress; and if this question could be left to the sturdy farmers of the country they would tell you to economize in other directions less meritorious and give to them the best mail facilities practicable. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I think I understand the purpose of this experiment. I have had more or less connection with it from its infancy until now. It originated, I believe, in the Fifty-first or Fifty-second Congress. I believe the first appropriation for this purpose—the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will correct me if I am inaccurate—was an appropriation of $10,000, made in the Fifty-first Congress.

The purpose of this whole experiment was simply to see if we could give to the masses of our people better mail facilities on reasonable and economical terms. Until the success of the experiment, as demonstrated by the Department, is conceded by this House there will be, of course, trouble in making this appropriation. If gentlemen will ask for information at the proper branch of the Department they will find that this is no longer an experiment.

The officials are thoroughly satisfied; and the only question now remaining is whether all these fourth-class offices can be abolished or not, or whether a portion of them will have to be retained in every locality as feeders, from which these carriers can get their bags of mail to be carried into the country. That is the question now being settled by experiment in the State of Maryland.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE], such time as he may wish, and then I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the total appropriations, including postal expenses, for the last year. They amounted to $674,981,022.20. The estimates for the coming year, including postal expenses, aggregate $738,855,247.78, and no doubt they will be increased from time to time.

The President in his late message states to Congress and the country that the deficiency for the last fiscal year was $89,111,559.67, and he only reaches the conclusion that there will be a surplus from the revenue of the present year by stating that the expense will reach only $600,958,122, while the official estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury is $138,000,000 more than that sum, including postal expenses.

I call attention to these facts for the purpose of asking the House of Representatives, and particularly this side, to do what it can to prevent extravagant appropriations, and thereby avoid another bond issue. But for the sale of bonds under the last and present Administrations we would have no money in the Treasury. If we continue as we have gone on for the last two or three years, spending more than is collected, we will bankrupt the Treasury; and the result will be that under the act passed by the last Congress, or under the one to be passed by this, we shall have another large bond issue. It may be said by some that we are not responsible for the legislation of this Congress, and that reckless appropriations would help us in a political sense; but we shall be responsible unless we firmly put ourselves in opposition to such appropriations. If we would avoid a further bonded debt we must economize at every point where it is possible to do so.

So far as this particular bill is concerned, I want to say that in the main I believe it ought to pass. The appropriations asked for the Army and Navy are necessary, in the judgment of the committee. So far as this side of the House is concerned, we tried to prevent the increase in the Army which makes this bill necessary. Many of us do not approve of the course pursued by the Administration; but our soldiers are already in the field under a law passed by a majority of Congress, and whatever we now think of the law or the war, in my judgment we can not refuse to pay, feed, and clothe the soldiers who carry our flag by order of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy.

We might avoid the expenditure of $150,000 for the experimental rural free delivery mail service. Mr. Chairman, how long do we propose to continue this experiment? It began in the Fifty-first Congress, ten years ago, and now you are asked to increase the appropriations of the last Congress 50 per cent for further experiment. I am in favor of free rural delivery if practicable and we can afford it; but I want it equitably and justly distributed among all the people, and it is not so at present.

The Department is in most cases experimenting in thickly settled communities. It is experimenting with people who live within a mile or two of post-offices. Back in the interior, 5, 10, 15 miles from any post-office, it is not proposed to carry the mail free. There are scores, hundreds, and thousands of neighborhoods in which no experiments have been made, and I understand, notwithstanding this, that in the State of Maryland a whole county has been included in a thickly populated free-delivery district. And yet you require people in the West and in the Southwest to go 5 and 10 miles for their mail. My idea is that these are the people who should have this service first, if there is to be any preference shown.

Now, if the Department has reached the point where it can say to the country that free rural delivery is economical and practicable, let it be extended to all parts of the country, but do not continue this system of favoritism by putting it in this and that district because of political influence. If good for a part of the people, it ought to be good for all. It must be fair and be just if it is to last. As has been said, this is not really a deficiency, but a new appropriation to continue free-delivery service in a few favored localities.

We might also save the $169,000 appropriated for the Paris Exposition. The limit for that was extended by the last Congress. We have now, if this bill passes, appropriated nearly twice as much as the limit fixed by the Congress which initiated the scheme.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just for a moment? This morning, at the beginning of this debate, I asked the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] where this special delivery rural service was in use. He said he did not know; but I was answered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who said that it was all over the country, except three States. Now, if he is correct, I want to say that some very watchful members of this body have been unable to see the service in operation. If he is correct, then I am forced to believe there are "pet" sections that have been served with it to the detriment of the less favored. Is my friend from Indiana correct in his statement?

Mr. RICHARDSON. And some very fine districts.

Mr. GAINES. You say it is found in spots, which is something like this war-time prosperity they have talked about.

Mr. McRAE. So far as I know and am informed, there is only one place in the State of Arkansas where they have attempted to experiment with it, although Arkansas has a million and a half of people.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But I may suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas, as the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in his last report, says, on the 1st of November, 1899, rural free delivery was in successful operation from 383 distributing points, radiating over 40 States and Territories, including the gentleman's own State.

Mr. McRAE. I said I thought there was only one district there now, and that does not radiate very far. It radiates about 10 miles from one place.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think it is doing very well, when it is in an experimental stage, with only $300,000 appropriated.

Mr. McRAE. My friend from Georgia has had the candor to say that we have passed the experimental stage, and those who have such service expect to keep it.

Mr. BARNEY. I will say to my friend that I hold in my hand a statement showing that his State of Arkansas at the present time has three rural free delivery routes in operation.

Mr. McRAE. That may be true. I have only heard of one.

Mr. BARNEY. And I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that that State has twenty-three routes in operation.

Mr. GAINES. Which end of the State, the Republican end, East Tennessee, or the Democratic end, middle and west Tennessee?

Mr. BARNEY. I understood that they were both Republican.

Mr. GAINES. No, sir, and never will be. I will be very frank and say to you that I have never heard of it operating down in my country, although we have tried to get it for the past year.

Mr. McRAE. As I have stated, I have only been informed of one, but admit we have three. We have 75 counties in Arkansas, to say nothing about distributing points, and you can not with $300,000 extend this service as it ought to be, if it is to be permanent and general.

Now, if we have passed the experimental stage and propose to enter upon this system of serving the people with their mails free, then appropriate money enough to do it in the regular way; but I am opposed to this system of favoritism, which will allow some officer to select one county or one district, or three counties, if you please, in a State to the exclusion of over seventy. I say that in the southern part of my State there has not been a solitary attempt to experiment with a view to free delivery. Then we are told that the roads are not good enough. Must we wait until we can get macadamized roads? The present mail carriers manage to get over the roads for very small pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, the same one from which I quoted a short time ago, says:

It has implanted itself so firmly upon the postal administration that it can no longer be considered in the light of an experiment.

Mr. McRAE. If that be true, and I grant it, why continue this appropriation for "experimental" purposes? Mark the language of the paragraph. It is to increase the appropriation for experimental rural free delivery service. If this statement is true it is a false pretense to ask it for experimental service, and it is not enough for permanent service in all the States. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] will not tell me that the amount is sufficient to meet the demands of the whole people. Then if it is not experimental, it is wrong to carry it into a few districts in the thickly settled parts of the country, like Georgia, Indiana, and various other States, and leave out the West and the South.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But this system is said by the proper authorities to be one of the best systems that has of late years been adopted by the Department.

Mr. McRAE. If they have reached that conclusion, then why continue it as an experiment, and why not extend it to all alike?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It was so good that he has exceeded the appropriation at the solicitation of members of Congress from every State.

Mr. GAINES. Is he treating it as an experiment or as a fixity?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As a fixity.

Mr. GAINES. Then why call or treat it as an experiment?

Mr. McRAE. If it is the fixed policy of the Post-Office Department to supply the people in that way, why is it not done and in a fair and just way?

Mr. GAINES. That would be right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When the appropriation bill comes up for the Post-Office Department we shall be asked for a million dollars.

Mr. GAINES. Then you ought to strike out now the word "experimental." A million dollars to experiment with when it has already proven to be a "success!"

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It was not in the last bill when it left the House.

Mr. McRAE. I repeat that the Department has had ten years in which to make experiments. If this is not for experiment, then the amount appropriated is not enough. The Department, having decided that the free-delivery system can be used in the rural districts, should now see to it that all sections of the country are treated alike and get a fair proportion of the money appropriated for that purpose. It is not the system against which I complain, but the administration and disbursement of the funds.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, before submitting any remarks of my own I will yield ten minutes, or such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, it is very clear that in the temper of the House as demonstrated here today this appropriation is going to be made, and I myself have no serious objection to the appropriation, but I do have objection to the methods that have been used in the expenditure of money relating to this rural free delivery service. I have been quite familiar with this subject, and, without taking any pride to myself, I will say that probably to my own efforts, in conjunction with those of the then Postmaster-General, Mr. Wilson—to our joint efforts the present rural free delivery service is due. In consultation with him we advised the establishment of the service, which would gradually permeate through the country, taking the most populous sections at first and gradually extending it.

The objection that I have to this appropriation—and it is one that does not seem to strike the House—is that the Executive Departments have defied the legislative department. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] satisfies his conscience, and various other gentlemen satisfy theirs, with the fact that this is an experimental service. Technically so, yes; but only technically so. There are many influences, Mr. Chairman, that retain this as an experimental service, and I can not believe that our Democratic friends can commend the continuance of the word "experimental" when they fully understand why that word is continued there.

Strike out the word "experimental" and quite a number of agents who are employed in establishing this service throughout the country, probably very good and efficient Republican workers, who are of great advantage to us and to our party, would be stricken from the pay roll, because the service will have become permanent. When you remove the word "experimental" the rural carriers will become civil-service employees of this Government. These are some of the reasons why the word "experimental" is continued. Last year the committee reported it with the word out, but the Senate, at the other end of the Capitol, for reasons best known to itself, insisted that the word "experimental" should be continued.

Well, now, this is not an experimental service. We have experimented with this service for ten years. We have come to that point where we have demonstrated that it is either a success or a failure. The House has treated it as a permanent appropriation, two years ago appropriating $50,000, one year ago appropriating $150,000, and the last year—for the current fiscal year—appropriating $300,000. What did the House mean when it appropriated $300,000 for rural free delivery service? It meant that the Department were authorized to establish such service as would cost $300,000. Now, this brings us back to two years ago, the first time in my recollection, and I think in the recollection of the gentleman who was chairman of this committee for some years preceding myself, that the Post-Office Department have ever created a deficiency upon an item or upon a service not warranted by statute.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations well said this morning that there are certain items, such as postmasters' salaries, such as the railway mail pay, such as the Army and Navy, where we provide for so many men in the Army and so many men in the Navy, and they must be paid, and could go to the Court of Claims and recover if we did not appropriate the money. But when it comes to clerk hire in post-offices, when it comes to the clerks in the Railway Mail Service, when it comes to the letter carriers, when it comes to the employees in the Post-Office Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, and every Department in Washington, Congress in its wisdom provides that so much money may be used by that Department for that purpose, not specified by statute.

Now, let us suppose, for instance, that any Department in Washington, after having an appropriation, we will say, to illustrate, of $500,000 for clerk hire, should go on and expend all that money in three months and come to Congress and say: "Well, unless you give us more, we will have to shut up shop." Is Congress to meekly bow to the executive and permit them, year after year, to say that, regardless of the action of the legislative body, we will employ such help and such persons as in our judgment seems fitting to us.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Would the alternative which you have stated be as bad as you say when the people of the country have good rural service, and they want it, because the Postmaster-General has made a mistake we are going to shut up shop and take this service away from them?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, let me say to the gentleman I do not think so; because when you touch a member's district you are touching a very tender point, as we found in the House two years ago when the Post-Office Department had put on more letter carriers in the cities to perform the service than the appropriation would permit. They then said to Congress, "We will run this service until next spring, and we will shut it off." What did you do? Why, you could not have the letter-carrier service shut off in your city! So you became an earnest advocate and approved the position of the Executive Departments, which had employed help in defiance of your mandate. Let us see how they will do this.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUD. I do not like to take up all the gentleman's [Mr. BARNEY's] time, but I would like to yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LOUD. I do.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. It is just a question for those of us who do not represent any rural districts. You say that this system has passed the experimental stage, and is either a success or a failure. What is it in the opinion of the Department?

Mr. LOUD. It is a success beyond the possibility of doubt, in my own opinion. Now, let us see what the Department will do and how they can influence Congress. If you want to approve it, I can stand it as well as you, but it may come to a legislative body in which it will plague you. They had $300,000 for rural free delivery service, and they extended it beyond the limit of that appropriation. It is giving great satisfaction where it is inaugurated. Many members of Congress think, perhaps, their nomination and election to Congress depend upon the continuance of that service.

Now they have put on enough to create a deficiency of $50,000, and they say to us: "Well, here, if you do not give us this money, we will run all the rural free delivery service, some that has been established for years, until some time in May, when we will not have any money, and we will have to shut it off." Do you not see where you are placed? The executive coerces the legislative body, as it has done once before. Now, they are our fellows this time. This is a Republican Administration; and the strange spectacle is presented here of the Democratic party en masse rising up here and commending the breaking of the law and the defiance of the legislative body, and only two, who happen to be upon the Republican side, are condemning the action of the Republican Executive Department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from California will admit we are not advocating a violation of the law, but in this instance, as the First Assistant Postmaster-General is extending a system of which the gentleman from California is the father, or at least the godfather, we think there are mitigating circumstances for this departure.

Mr. LOUD. I am glad to see that the gentleman places himself in the position at once as being the judge and jury, and determines whether there are circumstances warranting the course of the Department; and say once more, we do not care whether you obey the mandates of the legislative body or not.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. LOUD. Now, some gentlemen hide themselves under the word "experimental." It is hiding, because they say themselves in the next breath it is permanent; but they excuse the Executive because the word "experimental" was used. It does not change the conditions, Mr. Chairman, whether the word be used or not. I do condemn and will condemn every Administration that will create a liability not authorized by statute beyond what Congress in its wisdom proposes to give. Now, let us see how easy it would have been to obviate this. There was no necessity for it. Let us see how easy it would have been for them to provide for an expenditure for the full $300,000 and come to Congress at its session in December and said, "This is a good service; we have many demands for its extension, and we leave to your wisdom as to whether you desire to expend a greater amount of money than was appropriated last session."

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman from California think the propriety of an appropriation to extend this service from May to July has any proper relation to the question of whether the Postmaster-General has exceeded his authority or not? Is there not some other way to punish an official for exceeding his authority than discontinuing a service which is a benefit to the people?

Mr. LOUD. Of course there is. The Postmaster-General, I suppose, could be impeached and perhaps removed from office. I do not know—I am not competent to judge—whether this is an offense of sufficient gravity or not, but I do not believe he will be impeached. [Laughter.] I am only calling the attention of Congress to the gravity of this condition, which is liable to go on. If Congress will repeatedly, year after year, say to the executive branches of this Government by its action, "You can expend as much money for any purpose as you see fit and we will make it up in the end"—if Congress says that, let it say so after it understands the conditions that confront it. Fifty thousand dollars is not much, but the offense looks as great in my eyes as though it were fifty millions, because they have defied the legislative branch of this Government.

Of course rural delivery is in most of our districts. You are going to vote to condone the offense because you are afraid you are going to lose a little rural delivery.

Mr. BARHAM. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. BARHAM. If this is still in the experimental stage, then has the Department violated the law?

Mr. LOUD. Technically, no; but do not let us quibble over that.

Mr. BARHAM. Now, if it is still experimental—you say no, technically—can Congress say this is not experimental, when in the very act itself it says it is?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. BARHAM. Then why should we abuse the Department? It is the technical position you are taking.

Mr. LOUD. Perhaps it is my dullness in expressing myself that the House does not understand. The House is quibbling again over the word "experimental."

Mr. GAINES. Which side is the gentleman from California on? [Laughter.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. May I ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. LOUD. One moment. This House will appropriate, but let us be fair with one another. Do not let us endeavor to hide ourselves under the word "experimental." The House appropriated $300,000 for rural delivery service, and we said you are authorized to expend that during the next fiscal year, and the statute provided that they could neither expend nor create any further liability.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to ask the gentleman from California a question upon that point.

Mr. LOUD. I have not concluded my sentence. Now, then, a service is established which you and I know is going to continue. It has been in existence in some districts three or four years. They go on and extend the service and create such a liability against the Government that they must come to Congress and say, "We will destroy the whole service next May if you do not grant this appropriation."

Mr. BARHAM. Why did we not be honest with the Department and take out the word "experimental?" Why are not we the fellows that are dishonest? [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman from California allow me an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. I would like to stay here and answer questions for half an hour, but I am using up the gentleman's time, and I do not know but that he is getting nervous. How much time have I used, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to ask the gentleman from California when this service became other than "experimental?" So far as I know, there has not been a route established in Ohio, except those established under the last appropriation, and I think the same thing can be truly said of a great many States. I would like to ask when the service became other than experimental?

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman is mistaken about Ohio. I think Ohio gets about all the good things going, and I never knew her to be behind. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand the gentleman from California is advocating the application of the strict letter of the law with reference to appropriations. Is that true?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who yielded to me suggests that I occupy five minutes more.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. GRIGGS. I want to say—

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor? [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman has said that this House is hiding behind the word "experimental."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California declines to yield.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understood the gentleman from California to yield to me.

Mr. LOUD. I did, but I could not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. GRIGGS. I used the word "experimental," saying that the service was wholly experimental, excusing the Department for that reason. Now, the gentleman says the service is not experimental, and says it is a "quibble."

Mr. LOUD. No doubt about that in my mind.

Mr. GRIGGS. When it suits the gentleman's purpose in arguing a strict enforcement of the letter of the law, and gentlemen reply in the letter of the law, using the exact language, then the gentleman charges that they are quibbling. It appears to me that he is the quibbler.

Mr. LOUD. No, Mr. Chairman. I am not so much a stickler for the strict letter of the law, but I do ask for the enforcement of the law in its spirit, and what I desired to call the attention of this House to is this: This is the second time you have been confronted with this very proposition. You will be confronted with similar propositions in days to come. While Congress may give this $50,000 or $100,000, if they wish, I have no objection to that, but the House must understand that it is confronted with the fact that this Department has exceeded the authority vested in it by law. All I would have Congress do is to express its disapproval of that thing, so that we shall not have a repetition of it in the future.

Mr. GRIGGS. Why not put that in at the conclusion of the bill instead of the conclusion of that item?

Mr. LOUD. Because, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations said, this is the only item in the bill where there has been a violation of the law of Congress. I will not say myself as to that, because I do not know, but he says that all the other deficiencies are such deficiencies as could be created by statute.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman exceedingly for his courtesy in referring to me as being nervous on account of having a "speech in my stomach," and I suppose he speaks from his own long personal experience in that respect.

Mr. LOUD. I have got my speech out.

Mr. BARNEY. I desire to occupy, however, but a very few moments in calling attention to some matters in this bill relating to the subject of free rural mail delivery.

In the first place, I think it is well for the committee to know about how many of these rural free delivery routes there are at the present time established in the United States and their location. I have the information from the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General that there are some 700 postal rural free delivery routes in operation in this country at present. Now, while I sympathize much in what was said by the distinguished chairman of this committee in reference to the Post-Office Department going further than the original appropriation, and I fully agree with him upon the general proposition that this body ought not to allow to go unrebutted the creation of the necessity of a deficiency contrary to law, at the same time I believe that other gentlemen upon the floor were technically correct and were actually right in saying that there has been no actual deficiency in this service.

The appropriation, in other words, has been for an experiment, and I believe it has been truthfully said that the First Assistant Postmaster-General had the right, legally and technically, to appropriate all of that fund, if he saw fit, for use in the first three months. And I want to say right here that I think that any rural free delivery route established within the last three months has just as good a right to continuance as one that was established four years ago. They are all thus far experiments, and one just as much so as the other.

Mr. SWANSON. That is right.

Mr. BARNEY. That is the point I make, and when they are claiming that this is a great wrong in establishing these new routes and then coming in here and asking to provide for them, my answer is, Go back and discontinue the routes which were organized three or four years ago and continue those which were organized within the last year, and then there will be no deficiency. I apprehend, however, that those who were in "on the first floor" would not agree to this proposition.

It may be of some interest to this committee to know something about how these postal delivery routes are distributed. The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] said that he was in favor of enforcing this law "according to its spirit." Mr. Chairman, it is true he has been in favor of the enforcement of this law "according to its spirit," because the records show that to-day, while there are only 700 of these routes in the United States, giving on an average about 2 to each Congressional district, there are organized and in operation in his district 13 of these rural free delivery routes.

Now, if that is true, was he not correct in saying that he has always been in favor of the enforcement of this provision of law "according to its spirit" and according to all of its technicalities? That appears to me to be correct, and I say to him now that if he complains because of this expenditure in excess of the appropriation—I have no doubt that his routes have been in operation for several years—all he has to do is to agree to the discontinuance of those 13 routes, and that will save the Government something like five or six thousand dollars.

Again, I call attention to the fact that if every member of this House had secured for his constituents the same privileges in proportion which the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has secured for his, this deficiency, instead of being $150,000, would have been $5,000,000.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It would not have been experimental.

Mr. BARNEY. That is so, and that is what comes from the enforcement of this law according to its spirit, by the distinguished gentleman from California. Now, I say while we may criticize the Post-Office Department for its action in this respect, in my judgment members in this House are more open to criticism than the Post-Office Department. Why? Because we all agree that technically the First Assistant Postmaster-General had the right to expend all of this amount within the first three months, or within the first sixty days, or the first thirty days. Such being the case, he knowing of that technicality, and we knowing of that technicality, if we have gone to him and asked him for extensions of that privilege within our district, we are to blame, and not he, for his being compelled to come in here asking us for an additional appropriation of $150,000 for the purpose of carrying out what we ourselves have initiated. Now, is not that correct?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest one thing to my colleague right there?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Suppose it had taken the Postmaster-General two years, or ten years, to make the experiment, was not that appropriation available?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it limited to days or months at all?

Mr. BARNEY. Not at all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am asking for information. Was that $300,000 limited to this fiscal year?

Mr. BARNEY. It was limited to this fiscal year, but he could have expended it within the first thirty days, within the first three months, or have expended it during the whole year, in his discretion.

Mr. Chairman, this free rural mail delivery system has already gone beyond the experimental stage, and is now so only in name upon our statute books. We give free delivery in cities where the population exceeds 10,000, and have done so for many years. I find no fault with this, for I believe that service is just and proper; but I call your attention to the fact that nearly all of the patrons of these large post-offices live comparatively near the office of general distribution, and yet their mail is brought to their doors, while the rural patrons of our post-offices live miles away from the offices of general distribution, and yet no such service is given to them. Our farmers bear their full proportion of the burdens of Government, and in my judgment they are entitled to a just share of its favors. Extend to them this privilege and they will have an object lesson before them every day that they are objects of the nation's regard.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. According to your statement, then, if a Cabinet officer violated the law or his authority when solicited to do so by an individual member of Congress, would we be bound by it as a body?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly not; because, as I have already said, the First Assistant Postmaster-General has not violated the law in expending the larger portion of this money in the first six months, and therefore in appropriating for this deficiency we are not approving of any violation of law.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman right in that connection allow me to make a suggestion? The Postmaster-General to-day could say, "I am allowed $300,000 for experimental rural free delivery. I have tested it during the first six months of the present fiscal year. I have reached a conclusion as to that experiment with reference to that appropriation," and therefore there would be no violation of the law. In other words, he could expend the whole sum in three months, in four months, or in six months; but he comes now to Congress and says, "I want this to continue through the year, and in order to do that I ask Congress for this additional sum."

What I want to make clear is that as you state it is wholly within the province of the Postmaster-General to say that in the town where he locates his experimental free delivery, that experiment can run for three or six months, just as he may determine.

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. And then he can close it out?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. And would not have to come to Congress for a deficiency.

Mr. BARNEY. And that is what in substance he does say. He says he has at the present time established 700 different routes, and if we want those to continue, and if we want to have others established where there are petitions for the same, that we must give him $150,000 additional. If we are not in favor of it, if we are opposed to this rural free delivery, all we have got to say is that we will not give him any more money, and then it will all stop about the 1st of May, including the 13 in the district of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and the one established within my district within the last thirty days.

Mr. LATIMER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BARNEY. Yes.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to know if there is a deficiency now? That is, if all these rural free deliveries were to stop to-day, is there a deficiency?

Mr. BARNEY. No.

Mr. LATIMER. Then he has not violated the law.

Mr. BARNEY. There is no deficiency at the present time, and will be none, as I am informed, until about the 1st of May.

Mr. MILLER. The 15th.

Mr. BARNEY. The 15th of May, I am informed by the gentleman on my left. That is to say, that the present appropriation will continue the present routes until about the 15th of May.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. You say there have been about 700 routes established. Have you got them classified by States?

Mr. BARNEY. I have; and before I close my remarks I desire to have a tabulated statement of that classification incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. How many of these rural free delivery routes has the State of Indiana at the present time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Like Ohio, Indiana usually gets its share.

Mr. BARNEY. Indiana has 63.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. How many has Ohio?

Mr. BARNEY. Eighty-three.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. How many has the State of Texas?

Mr. BARNEY. Two.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many applications has the State of Texas made?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Quite a number.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How many of these rural free-delivery routes has the State of Mississippi?

Mr. BARNEY. Unless your eyes are better than mine, I do not think you can find any in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. GAINES. How many has the State of Tennessee?

Mr. BARNEY. The State of Tennessee has a pretty good share, it has 24.

Mr. GAINES. Are not those in the Republican end of the State?

Mr. BARNEY. I do not know; but I think that when the other end has the benefit of improved mail facilities it will be Republican also.

Mr. GAINES. You admit that your Executive has dominated and controlled the Representatives of Congress and ought to be impeached. This body—the House—is the forum to file articles of impeachment. Now, we will see if this House, ruled by a Republican majority, will fail to do its duty.

Mr. BARNEY. I am going to have this statement incorporated as a part of my remarks, and I do not think it advisable to ask any more questions as to its contents.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am free to admit that the Department has been free from partiality in my Democratic district in Indiana.

Mr. LATIMER. As a member from the State of South Carolina, I wish to say there has been no partiality with reference to this system there.

Mr. BARNEY. The record shows that the State of South Carolina has a larger percentage of its population supplied with the free delivery than any other State in the Union, and this, I presume, because its Representatives went to the Department and asked for it. No doubt they were more diligent than some others have been; but there has been no partisanship in the distribution of this favor, for there is no State which is more essentially Democratic than the State of South Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Are we to understand that these routes are established, not in accordance with the public need or the judgment of the Department, but in accordance with the importunity of members?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly the gentleman will understand if you want favors of this kind and will call the attention of the Department to the fact and to the needs of your constituents, you will be more likely to get them than you otherwise would.

Mr. BENTON. The question I want to ask the gentleman is if I am right in understanding him to state that he has had a route established within the last thirty days?

Mr. BARNEY. Perhaps I said so. If I did, I made a mistake, for I think it was some time in the month of November.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have this statement from the Post-Office Department concerning free-delivery service incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks a certain statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Would you tell to us—some of us have no free-delivery enterprise in our districts—in brief, how this system has increased and what effect it has been proven to have on the post-office?

Mr. BARNEY. From what I can learn of the matter—and most I have learned of it is by asking the Post-Office Department, for I have little personal experience in the matter—I think it is believed that on account of the saving in the expense of the star routes through the extension of the system, and in the increase of the postal service through the delivery of mail, letters, papers, etc., it will be substantially self-sustaining; and I am told that experience shows it is self-sustaining in all places where it has been in operation six months or more.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, so I may directly answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Where do the routes start for this rural free delivery?

Mr. BARNEY. Anywhere designated by the Post-Office Department. It may be a first-class, a second-class, a third-class, or fourth-class post-office.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it not generally from a post-office on a railroad?

Mr. BARNEY. Almost universally. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to answer the question put by the gentleman from Illinois. The town in which I live, Westchester, is in a thoroughly rural community. Fairer or more fertile lands can not be found anywhere within the United States, and the records will sustain my statement. Within a circle of 5 miles from the court-house steeple at Westchester and beyond the borough boundaries there is not an institution containing more than an ordinary family in size and one village perhaps of 150 people. A year ago this service was established in that territory. It was established because everybody asked for it.

I presented the petition, and an examination was made of the surroundings, and the report of a post-office inspector was such as to lead the Department to order the service. On page 85 of the First Assistant Postmaster-General's report is found a very comprehensive and lucid statement of the result of the operation at this point. For the information of the gentleman from Illinois I would like to have the opportunity of giving him a few figures. The gentlemen of the committee will understand that the mail in this community is neither served to nor collected from any institution or any advertising concern. It is important that this statement should be made and accepted in order to add to the force of the figures which I am about to submit. An early morning mail is delivered by a carrier to a school, unimportant, and should not be considered as bearing upon or adding to the success of the experiment in this district. All the rest of the mail is delivered to the farmers, storekeepers, laborers, and mechanics, as well as the people of leisure who live in this community. The experience of the Department here shows a remarkable figure and proves the disposition of the people to patronize the service.

This experiment is cited by the First Assistant Postmaster-General to show the advantages of the service to country districts, as well as to show the profit the Government may expect to reap from similar services. By this report he shows that this is a great accommodation to the farmer and a good thing for the Government. In January, 1899, the routes were established, 6 in number, and 6 letter carriers start at 9 o'clock each morning and distribute the mails 5 miles from the town, and on their routes they also make the collections. In January, 1899, the month in which the service was established, each carrier handled 1,933 pieces of mail. That was considered by the Department a very remarkable exhibition.

In the month of September, the same year, each carrier handled 6,481 pieces of mail, traveling over the same routes. In the same territory the same carriers, each, in a daily distribution and collection only, went from a thousand and some pieces in January to six thousand and some pieces in September, attesting the intelligence of the patrons of the service as well as their determination to use it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What was the time?

Mr. BUTLER. From January to September. The First Assistant Postmaster-General in his report says—and by the way, I hope the gentlemen will allow me to suggest that they examine this report, on page 85, where they will find a map of the territory where the service is located, showing the location of the different boxes to accommodate the people—the Department has made a fair estimate of the value of the postage on the matter collected at 2 cents per piece, amounting on the 119,668 pieces collected to $2,393.26. This not only pays for the service, but leaves a balance of $593.36 in favor of the Government in those few months. This is the report in full and is a much more intelligent and concise statement than I can hope to make in the few minutes allotted me:

HOW THE RURAL SERVICE CAN BE MADE TO PAY.

As a practical illustration of how rural free delivery, when carefully established, can be made self-supporting, the following tabulated statement has been prepared:

Summary of rural free delivery at Westchester, Chester County, Pa., six carriers, January to September, inclusive.

1899.	Delivered.	Collected.	Total.	Average per carrier.
January	9,133	2,468	11,601	1,933
February	12,499	6,353	18,852	3,142
March	13,864	7,997	21,861	3,977
April	16,031	8,985	25,016	4,169
May	18,093	20,882	38,975	6,495
June	19,648	22,145	41,793	7,132
July	16,598	18,662	35,260	5,876
August	21,509	16,621	38,130	6,355
September	24,277	14,610	38,887	6,481
Total	155,805	119,668	275,473	5,099

This service was instituted January 1, 1899. No post-offices or star routes were discontinued. Two fourth-class post-offices have ceased to exist in consequence of their patrons being supplied by rural delivery. The cost of the service for the nine months it has been in existence has been $1,800. A fair estimate of the value of the postage on matter collected is 2 cents per piece, amounting on the 119,668 pieces collected to $2,393.26, thus not only paying for the service but leaving a balance of $593.36, after affording the people a much appreciated free delivery and collection service which they had not heretofore possessed.

If it had not been for the rural collection service, practically all the above sum would have been absorbed by fourth-class postmasters and the people would have been compelled to send to Westchester or some other office for the 155,805 pieces of mail delivered without charge almost at their doors. The thoroughness with which the district adjacent to Westchester has been covered by rural free delivery is shown in the accompanying map.

Now, later than this is the report by the postmaster at Westchester, made to a reporter of the Philadelphia Press, a very reliable paper, and I would like to have the opportunity to read it, for I think it will satisfy gentlemen as to the accommodation this free delivery furnishes the farmers and its value to the Government. This paper is dated January 11, 1900.

The article is as follows:

WESTCHESTER, January 11.

Postmaster Harry G. Smith this morning forwarded to the Post-Office Department at Washington, D. C., his report upon the first year of rural free delivery in Chester County, and finds that the experiment has been a pronounced success. Chester County it is expected will furnish the best data from the districts in the United States where the experiment has been introduced, and will offer abundant evidence for the extension of the system.

Postmaster Smith's report shows that the rural free delivery system here covers the entire country surrounding Westchester for about 9 miles in every direction, and that six suburban carriers are required for the work. The cost to the Government for this service for the year has been $2,400, and the revenues, estimated at 2 cents per piece upon 170,651 pieces collected, $3,531.22, leaving a balance in favor of the Government of $1,131.22.

Had it not been for the rural collection service all this sum would have been absorbed by fourth-class postmasters, and the people would have been compelled to send to Westchester or some other office for 231,083 pieces of mail matter delivered at their doors.

The farmers on these routes regard the service as indispensable, and not only want it continued, but are at the same time clamoring for an afternoon delivery, which has been ordered by the Department, but which will not be introduced until Congress appropriates the necessary funds.

More than this, Postmaster Smith reports an increase in the business of the Westchester office of over $8,000 for the past year, and reports that, with the improved facilities for delivering and collecting the mail, people patronize the postal service more extensively than ever before.

The total number of patrons on the rural routes is 2,137; total number of families, 676; total number of registered letters, 88; total number of special delivery letters, 32.

The total business of the Westchester office for the year amounted to $34,000, which is greater than that of any city of the size of Westchester in the State.

During the reading the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that my time be extended two minutes.

Mr. BARNEY. I do not want it extended out of my time, because I have promised to yield it all, and I can not afford it.

Mr. BUTLER. I only ask for two minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes out of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. Chairman, I want to impress upon the members of the committee the absolute reliability of the statement that this report is not padded and that this community, composed of 647 families (as I have heretofore described), large farmers, small farmers, people who make a profit out of their farms and who will continue to make profit out of them, industrious laborers, mechanics, and storekeepers, has furnished to this Government during the last year a profit of $1,200 on these six carriers. It is estimated by the Department that should the necessity arise to double the mails twice a day the Government will receive $2,400 profit each year.

Another surprising statement, which is true, is that some of the post-offices in this circuit show an increase of business. Having lived in this town nearly all my life, I know the name and face of every man, woman, and child in the territory covered by this service, and I know the personnel has not changed in the last year, but that the same people live there who lived there the year before. They are people who feel the prosperity, if there is any prosperity, in their own precincts, people of superior intelligence, and I simply point to their record, made by themselves, to verify my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman from Georgia, and I hope I shall have the opportunity some time to return the favor. I guess I never shall, however, for I suppose I shall not be here long enough to induce the Speaker to trust me with the disposition of the time of the House. [Laughter.] I make this statement to show that all this increase in the mails in that circuit comes from the disposition to read and write, to take the newspapers, and to receive and send mail. This service gives the people the facilities they want. They have used them and will continue to use them to their own great advantage and to the profit of the Government. The farmers in my district are united in their demand that this system be continued and additional services established, and I am here for the purpose of securing them such assistance as I may be able to reach, that their accommodations may be enlarged and continued. There is no reason why they should not have some of this Government's patronage and the conveniences furnished by it as well as the people who live in brick houses and behind brick pavements. [Applause.]

It is about the only real direct accommodation which the Government can offer those who live in rural districts, and there should be no hesitation in Congress to make a sufficient appropriation for the purpose of continuing these experiments, which are bound to result in a permanent system of rural free deliveries in every locality where they are requested and in which the Department will be justified in establishing them.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and, Mr. ADAMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BARNEY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on this bill, but since the action of the First Assistant Postmaster-General in extending this service beyond the point contemplated by the original appropriation has been made the subject of criticism I feel that I should say a few words. If he be guilty, I am also guilty. I believe that an examination of the record of the Post-Office Department will disclose the fact that the district which I have the honor of representing has more free rural delivery routes than any other district in the United States. Soon after this experiment was decided upon, the people in my district commenced petitioning for the service. I at once interested myself in the matter, urged upon the Post-Office Department its importance, and because I was on the ground early, rather than because I was specially favored by those in authority, is due the fact that the people of my district have this service to a greater extent than any other district and possibly have more petitions on file for additional service.

I want to say that no money expended by this Government is better expended than that which goes to this service. I have watched its working closely. It is admirable in every respect. For instance, routes leading out from the various county seats in my district show not only a gratifying increase in postal patronage, but show advantages in other directions. A real-estate man recently told me that farms along these free-delivery routes were worth $3 to $5 more an acre than farming land off the free-delivery routes. Every dollar that goes into this appropriation encourages the building of better roads. There are scores of farmers with teams at work to-day building turnpikes, because they see, in the near future, the postman calling at the door of the farmhouse every morning delivering letters and daily papers.

This service, if extended, will do more for this Republic than many gentlemen on the floor now anticipate. Nine out of ten of the men who have directed the affairs of this nation since its organization were born on the farm; there they learned to work; there they learned the value of time and money; there they learned lessons of thrift and economy. Of recent years the farmer's boy has shown an inclination to turn his back on the fields; he is to-day seeking the cities. Why? He tires of the monotony; he longs for society. Place in his hands the magazine, give him the daily paper, cheer him with a package of letters, and you will reconcile him to the farm. I contend that in this Republic the farm is the nursery of greatness, and that Congress can do nothing wiser than to make an annual appropriation that will do so much to brighten the daily life of those who toil in the fields.

Another thing—this system is a great educator. It stimulates and fosters education. The farmer's boy and the farmer's girl are ambitious. And I want to say that they are, with fewer advantages, to-day better informed than the city boy and girl. I have been surprised at the number of letters I have received this winter from school-teachers in my district living along these routes, asking for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, stating that they are keeping advised in matters of legislation, that the children were studying the science of government. So that not only is this system of advantage to those living in the country in the matter of receiving the daily letter and the daily paper, but it is a source of additional education and enlightenment.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] seeks to reprimand the Post-Office Department. As my friend has just stated, he has 13 of the 700 routes. His district is made up of two counties, possibly three. San Francisco is a part of his district. Thirteen free rural delivery routes would almost entirely cover the remainder of his district. Then it is safe to say that nearly every man, woman, and child in his district has a free mail delivery service. I do not object to being scolded. I do not think the Post-Office Department objects to being scolded, but we do object to being scolded by people whose entire constituency have the benefit of this service.

I am in favor of this service. I am in favor of it because it reaches a class of people in this country who appreciate it and who receive direct advantages from this Government in no other way. Take my own Congressional district, made up of seven counties, agricultural communities. We have never received a dollar from the river and harbor bill. The people in my district never received a dollar from a public-building bill. There is no city in that district of more than 12,000 population. Yet none of us who live in these agricultural communities begrudge the cities the improvements that go along the seaboard; none of us begrudge you what you get for your public buildings. The farmers are not found objecting.

Neither do we want you to object when we ask for a miserable pittance in order that we may have some of the advantages which come to people who live in the large cities. This is a good way to get in touch with the man who lives on the farm, away from town, away from the city. He is lonesome. He works all day. At night, if he gets his daily paper, he is compelled to send his boy, or go himself, 5 or 6 or 7 or 8 or 9 miles. The man in town is near the post-office and has his mail served to him. I believe that people in towns of 10,000 to 30,000 population should be made secondary in free mail service to the man who lives on the farm, because they are near the post-office and the man in the country is distant from the post-office.

You talk about the farmer. He is no longer distinctively a farmer. He is also a business man. The farmer of to-day not only tills the soil but he reads the newspaper and keeps in touch with the markets more closely than he ever did before. He gets quotations every morning. Out in the district which I represent the entire country is threaded with the telephone wire, running everywhere throughout those seven counties. Hundreds of farmers in my district have telephones in their homes. They keep in touch with their neighbors; they keep in touch with the cities; they keep in touch with what is going on throughout the country.

The farmer of to-day is a business man and he demands modern advantages; he asks for the same opportunities accorded his brother in the city; he insists on being considered by the American Congress when the appropriation bill is brought in, and as far as I am concerned I will not only gladly vote for this additional appropriation of $150,000, but I should take great pleasure in trebling that appropriation right now and right here. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Make it a million.

Mr. LANDIS. I would be in favor of making it a million dollars, and I say that the gentleman who officiates as First Assistant Postmaster-General, in anticipating this matter, in providing possibly for the expenditure of more money than has been contemplated by the Committee on Appropriations, simply demonstrates the fact that he is in harmony with the times; that he is keeping up with the procession; that he is in touch with the people, and I am for his appropriation.

I do not know how long I shall remain in Congress, but I hope to remain here long enough to vote for a free rural postal appropriation large enough to deliver to every farmer in the United States of America, where it is at all practicable, at least one mail every day. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY].

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, this matter which we have been discussing here to-day is no new matter to me. I remember in the sixties when free deliveries were established in the cities, it was said that the person who instigated free delivery, or the postmaster who favored free delivery at that time (we being in the midst of a war)—that postmaster ought to be hung, because he was spending the people's money in a reckless manner. He was putting up letter boxes throughout the city, he was employing carriers at the rate of a thousand dollars a year, when that money was needed for the support of the Government. This prophecy turned out to be incorrect, as it will in this matter of rural delivery. In many of the towns already this service has been self-sustaining, and it will continue to be, in my judgment.

Let me say that within a very few months after free-delivery service went into operation the free-delivery service more than doubled and the receipts were largely in excess of the increased expenditure. So much for that. I simply speak of this to show that it is no new matter. Now, the people of the country towns, seeing the cities having free deliveries by carriers, are demanding that they themselves shall have the same rights and privileges that the people of the cities have, and I honor them for standing for that which they believe to be their right.

Now, you talk about the Postmaster-General acting without authority by going further in expenditure in rural delivery than he ought to. Why, it has been thoroughly proven here to-day that he has not exceeded his authority. He has gone so far, and he has called a halt, and now he says, "Unless you give us $150,000 more I have got to stop this service." The Postmaster-General is entirely right. It has been said here that it is highly important, and in my opinion it is highly important, that the Postmaster-General should obey the law, but at the same time gentlemen fail to tell me where he has broken the law in any single instance. He simply calls to our attention the fact that more money is needed if this valuable service is to continue. I commend him for the action he has taken and can not see wherein any wrong has been done on his part.

Now, you take the farmer, who lives in the country, miles away from a post-office. He is in the midst of harvest, if you please. He has to get up his horse, and he rides for one or two hours to the post-office for the mail for himself and family. His people are expecting a letter; but when he arrives at the post-office he finds no mail for himself or family. He repeats his visits day after day. There is a loss of valuable time in the midst of the harvest season, whereas, under the rural free delivery system, if a letter comes for him, why, the carrier takes it to him, and it is a time-saving machine all around.

I certainly regret the course that this debate has taken, in attempting to charge upon the Post-Office Department a violation of the law. In my judgment there has been none; and if there has been any, it is because the representatives of the people go to the Post-Office Department and get them to break the laws; and if the Department did not provide that service you would call it a pretty mean Department. If the law has been technically violated, which I do not believe it has been, it is because you members have importuned the Department to break it. But the law has not been broken. The rural free delivery service has come to stay; it is in the line of progress, and it will stay, in my judgment, as long as grass grows and water runs. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARNEY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I believe I state aright the sentiment here when I say that this appropriation for the extension of rural free delivery will receive the unanimous support of the House. Indeed, as Congress must pass this bill before the moneys appropriated can be used to continue routes established, it would seem that this legislative sanction of the service would entirely free the Department from any charge of having exceeded its authority in establishing the more recent routes.

I appreciate the situation of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who, as "watchdog of the Treasury," feels that there may have been an undue extension of power, but who joins his committee in reporting favorably this item and who declares he will vote in favor of it. Under the sentiment that pervades here, this duty that he feels he owes must needs be performed half-heartedly.

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has many times shown himself a conservator of the public interest, but in no way more pronounced than as one of the fathers of this system of rural delivery. I hope he will follow his distinguished chief and his own feelings, as I believe he will, and vote for this appropriation. He has received unbounded thanks of gratitude from the people, and still more praise and promise is in store for him by an extension of the system of free rural delivery. He receives the most generous encouragement from that able and alert First Assistant Postmaster-General, Hon. Perry S. Heath, who in his recent report elaborately explains in all its details this system, and gives it as his opinion that it is one of the most beneficial policies of the Government. The following is found in his recent report:

"There has been nothing in the history of the postal service of the United States so remarkable as the growth of the rural free delivery system. Within the past two years, largely by the aid of the people themselves, who, in appreciation of the helping hand which the Government extended to them, have met these advances halfway, it has implanted itself so firmly upon postal administration that it can no longer be considered in the light of an experiment, but has to be dealt with as an established agency of progress, awaiting only the action of the Congress to determine how rapidly it shall be developed.

"The facts hereinafter set forth, with some elaboration of detail which the importance of the subject seems to me to warrant, will demonstrate—

"I. That the free delivery of mails in rural communities can be widely extended with great benefit to the people and with little cost to the revenue.

"II. That whenever the system has been judiciously inaugurated with a sincere purpose to make it a success it has been followed by these beneficial results:

"1. Increased postal receipts. More letters are written and received. More newspapers and magazines are subscribed for. So marked is this advancement that quite a number of rural routes already pay for themselves by the additional business they bring.

"2. Enhancement of the value of farm lands reached by rural free delivery. This increase of value has been estimated at as high as $5 per acre in some States. A moderate estimate is from $2 to $3 per acre.

"3. A general improvement of the condition of the roads traversed by the rural carrier. In the Western States, especially, the construction of good roads has been a prerequisite to the establishment of rural free-delivery service. In one county in Indiana a special agent reports that the farmers incurred an expense of over $2,600 to grade and gravel a road in order to obtain rural free delivery.

"4. Better prices obtained for farm products, the producers being brought into daily touch with the state of the markets, and thus being enabled to take advantage of information heretofore unattainable.

"5. To these material advantages may be added the educational benefits conferred by relieving the monotony of farm life through ready access to wholesome literature, and the keeping of all rural residents, the young people as well as their elders, fully informed as to the stirring events of the day. The moral value of these civilizing influences can not be too highly rated."

It is clear that rural free delivery has gone beyond its experimental stage and has become an established fact and system. This is alike proven by the needs of the people, their wishes, and the duty of Government. The field of experimentation has covered the States of—

Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin.

On November 1, 1899, in my State, Indiana, there were 44 of these routes in successful operation, as they were indeed everywhere where favorably established.

I desire especially to call to the attention of the House the able and intelligent report of Special Agent E. H. Hathaway and the other special agents, embodied in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, which show clearly the efficacy and utility of the system. A careful reading of all the history furnished bearing on this subject convinces me that with its proper development it will become a revenue producer to the Government.

Time will not permit me to elaborate its great benefit to the people served. It brings the farmer and his family, who for years have borne the principal burden of taxation, closer in touch with cities and city advantages, giving them newspapers early, and postal facilities to awaken and encourage them on, not to speak of the time saved for useful pursuits that heretofore has been spent in going distances after mail. This system encourages the building of good roads, always a proof of progress. Mr. Francis M. Dice, special agent of the western division, well said in a recent address:

Rural free delivery of mail, so much needed among our farmers, can never obtain except in localities possessing good thoroughfares, insuring rapid transit at all seasons of the year.

As shown by the report referred to, it has received the support and cooperation of State Granges, Patrons of Husbandry, and of farmers generally, and it might be stated here that this class has not heretofore been too generously treated. The "good roads convention" held in October, 1899, in Iowa, passed resolutions favoring such an appropriation by Congress as would speedily and permanently establish the service throughout the country where the conditions as to good roads and population would justify, and asked the favorable consideration of the House and the Senate to that end.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General informs us that postmasters of the distributing offices have rendered the Department valuable aid in advancing the service.

From questions asked during the debate some inference might arise that politics entered into the subject. Speaking for my Democratic district in Indiana, after a careful investigation of this phase, I must free the Department from this reflection, as observation and experience have shown me that the Department's action so far has been patriotic and nonpartisan.

Mr. Chairman, the merit of this system, its strong and uniform indorsement by the Department having it in charge and by the people who have received its benefit, appeal to every member of this House to sustain the routes already established, and it is my hope, based upon the causes stated, that the Congress this session will appropriate not less than a million dollars for the further extension of rural free delivery.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is some misunderstanding about the bill, or was a misunderstanding in the beginning. Now, the Department has not gone beyond the appropriation. That wants to be kept in mind. But the Post-Office Department believes the experiment will prove successful. The man in charge of rural free delivery earnestly and sincerely believes it is to become the general policy of the Government, and from every point where men have come and complied with the law, regardless of the State or country, he has gone forth and examined, and if the conditions were such as to justify he has put the machinery in force.

He has now on his table 700 or 800 petitions filed, ready for action; but he refuses to act until he sees what Congress will do. If we refuse this appropriation, then there is no harm done so far as he is concerned, because he has simply circumscribed the experiment that he is making and comes within the appropriation, and when the fiscal year ends his accounts will balance exactly. Furthermore, while this man has been accused of going beyond his jurisdiction, he has not done so; but he has started certain experiments that if run up to the end of the year would go beyond the appropriation.

A part of the appropriation is to enable him to continue the service that he has started up to the end of the year. A portion of it is to go over fields where he is satisfied that it will not only be a success and self-sustaining, but will make a little revenue for the Government. That is what he asked, and as to any trenching or supposed trenching upon the powers of Congress in this case, it is in the direct interest of the American people, and while we boast, and rightfully, of the great exports of this country, the farmer, who gets less benefit from governmental favors than any other class in the country, produced and furnished over two-thirds of the exports during the past year, when we had such a balance of trade in favor of our country.

It is the farmer who demands that he should have his mail daily, the same as the city man. What does it mean to him? It means that he reads more; it means that he takes more literature; it means that he becomes better posted, and I wish to say to-day that the real education of this country is going on on the farm, in the shop, and among the laborers, rather than among your town people. It is with the laborers, it is with the farmers, that you will get the education that will drift this Government back to the circumscribed lines that were so wisely drawn for it in the beginning. I hope there is no one on this side who will raise his voice against extending this delivery to every portion of the country where the conditions are such as to make the present experiment successful.

As soon as you fill the places where the conditions of the country are such as to make it self-sustaining, then, like the post-office of to-day, we will take the revenues of these places and extend the system to points that are not self-sustaining. The result will be that we will get the mail to the countrymen in every part of this country without a loss to the Government of the United States. We will double the mail sent to the countryman, we will increase his intelligence, and let him go on developing his mind as he is doing now more rapidly than any other portion of the population of this great country.

Therefore I am in favor, directly and wholly, of this part of the appropriation, and I regret that there is a charge or intimation that the Postmaster-General, or assistant in charge of this portion of the service, has violated any law. I say he has done his full duty, and it is his conviction and earnestness and desire to make this a success in every part of the United States that has caused him to go as far as he has. But he has not gone beyond the point where he can come in on the 1st day of July and balance his books and show that he is not deficient a single cent in his Department. By refusing this appropriation we stop the progress of the experiment that has proved successful and most beneficial to the people of the United States.

Now, sir, I appreciate the position of our chairman of the Committee of Appropriations, Mr. CANNON, when he opposes the executive department, or any officer of it, trespassing upon the jurisdiction of any other department of this Government. I agree with our friend from California [Mr. LOUD], and there is a gentleman whom I admire on this floor for his convictions and the courage of his convictions. He always stands up and says what he means, whether it affects the practice and policy of his party or not. His objection, as I understand it, is not so much against extension of free delivery as it is against encroachment by the executive officer upon the legislative branch and overstepping the bounds of his legal duties.

Now, I appreciate that. I would like to join with him all along the line and curb the executive department from beginning to end. But I would not begin on a little petty sale department of the Government. I would go higher in the ranks. I would go to the Executive and say: "The Constitution of this Government provides that there shall be three coequal departments of the Government, neither one of which shall encroach on the jurisdiction or domain of the other."

I would say to the Executive: "You have no power or privilege in the House of Representatives or any right to bring any influence, beyond your usual messages, of any kind whatever to exert a power or influence over any other department." I want to say to you that since the days, at least, of President Cleveland the executive department of this Government has been pretty nearly the whole thing. The executive department of this Government is absorbing the powers and privileges of the other departments; and while I agree with the gentleman, I would begin higher up the line.

When Mr. Carlisle was Secretary of the Treasury, he was required to buy an amount of silver monthly, under the Sherman Act, and during the last week I was on a committee who went to him and said: "Mr. Carlisle, you have purchased one-half of the silver this month that the law requires that you should purchase: we want to know if you propose to purchase the remainder?" "Well," he said, "I don't know. I think you gentlemen out West are asking a little too much for your silver." Then we said: "Are you going to try to bear the price of silver, and does the statute of the United States say if you think the price is sufficient, you may buy?" "Well," he said, "I have got a week yet."

On the last day we returned to him and said, "Mr. Carlisle, are you going to buy the amount of silver that the law requires you to buy this month?" He said, "I have concluded not to buy." He threw down a telegram from an assayer in New York that said some silver had sold there that day for a price named, that I now forget, but it was away below the market price, and said, "I will buy all the law requires at that price." We reminded him that it was away below the market price, and was probably gotten up purposely to bear the price of silver, or rather to give the Treasury Department some kind of a pretense or excuse for not complying with the statute.

We further asked:

"Why have you concluded not to buy it in the face of a mandatory statute?"

He pulled down a report of Secretary Sherman under the Bland Act and said, "Here is my authority. Secretary Sherman, from month to month, under the old act, refused to buy it because he thought you gentlemen asked too much for your silver, and I am going to refuse to buy this month because I think you are asking more than your silver is worth." He did that, beyond any question, in the face of a mandatory statute. He did it in direct opposition to the laws passed by this body.

He did it for the purpose of destroying silver and of putting on this country a gold standard, in which he believed. That was the second highest Department in the Government. He cited like breaches of the law on the part of his predecessors, and when that same authority came to executing the Chinese-exclusion act he did not believe in it and he refused to execute it. The executive department of this Government to-day is executing laws whenever such execution suits its ideas of what ought to be executed, and is brushing them aside when it does not please it to execute them. I say I am in harmony with the idea of holding these gentlemen to the limit of the law and the Constitution of this country, but I would begin with bigger game.

Now, there are other parts of this bill of which I am also in favor. But I am not in favor of the causes which created the expenditures. I am in favor of paying the Army and the Navy, not because they are wisely used for the purpose of confiscating the political liberties of other people, but because the Government, through its machinery, has obligated itself and owes the debt, and we are in honor bound to pay it. Therefore I am supporting that portion of the bill, although they have made a debt of forty-seven millions that I do not think they should have created and was wholly unnecessary if civil diplomacy, instead of arrogant militarism, had been exercised.

I want to say that upon yesterday a good Republican living in my neighborhood called upon me to know what I thought of the way the Civil Service Commission executed the laws in its department. I said, "My friend, it does not execute them at all.

Ever since I have been in Washington I have believed it to be a good law but never executed." She said, "I was examined for a certain department in this Government. I know that I stood in advance of five other persons. I did not have a boss of the great Republican party behind me, though I did have a Republican member, and those five persons are working in that department and I am sitting around here in my room sucking my thumbs."

I said, "How and why are they there?" She said, "I will tell you. They put them on as common laborers, not required to be examined, and then they transfer them or put them to work on employment that does require examination." Others have told me that in departments here, supposed to be filled by civil-service examination, employees are put in temporarily for three months and then reappointed, reappointed, reappointed throughout the years, and these things are done and done at the instance of what are supposed to be the bosses of the party in power. If I had to say to-day what is the greatest menace to the Government of the United States, I should immediately reply "bossism in politics."

I want now, for one moment, to refer to what took place the other night in Philadelphia. I am not here to make an argument for the Democratic party; but I take it that when a man assaults the Democratic party he means the party that is headed by William Jennings Bryan, and I am as good a supporter of Mr. Bryan as any Democrat that draws the breath of life, and have as great an admiration for him. [Applause.]

Therefore, I take it that any assault on the Democratic party at this day means an assault upon the Bryan Democratic party. Now here is what the national chairman of the dominant party said the other night in Philadelphia, according to his own organ, the Washington Evening Star. In the first place, he appealed to the Republicans of Philadelphia that they should at once pay the $100,000 they had pledged for the privilege of entertaining the Republican convention. He said, "We must have it for the purpose of counteracting what the Democratic party is doing." He said:

The Democratic party is already at work on the Philippine question throughout the western part of our country. They have engaged numerous labor agitators—

Now, think of that—to foment among the working people of the entire West as much dissatisfaction with the existing conditions as lies in their power.

Now, sir, I will venture to say there is not a man in the broad West who is impartial and honest who will not pronounce that an absolute falsehood. Such a thing has never been heard of there. He further says:

The Republican campaign management is now meeting the agitators on their own ground by the employment of men to counteract that influence.

Admitting that they are employing laboring men at this early day and putting them under wages to go out and try to inveigle their fellow-laborers to vote the ticket that will politically enslave the people of the Philippine Islands and ultimately destroy the privileges and independence of the laborers of this country.

He says further:

Our men are of better character—

Now, you might say that that was at least a little egotistical—and of higher standing.

More dollar marks on them, according to his estimation.

But the Democrats have supplemented the work of these labor agitators by the distribution of a great quantity of campaign literature. We need the Philadelphia campaign fund of $100,000 in order to distribute literature at once which shall counteract the effect of the Democratic campaign material. I say to you, one dollar of campaign fund to-day is worth five dollars three months from to-day.

Now, I want you to listen to this:

The Democrats are bent upon making a most bitter campaign. It is their object to create strikes and paralyze the industries of the country. It is for this purpose their agitators are working throughout the West.

I pronounce that as an unqualified falsehood, and it is a stigma upon the West that is undeserved. The idea that the Democratic party or any portion of the people of this country are trying to create strikes and disturb business is ridiculous, and such a charge ought to be beneath an ordinary street scavenger. Trying to create strikes; trying to disturb business! Has American manhood become so low and depraved that any man of common sense could have such an idea of his brother man who did not wear the brass collar himself?

Is it possible that the chairman of this great party judges other men's aspirations and groveling propensities by his own measure?

Now, sir, there are some other questions that I wish I had the time to consider. One thing I should like to know is what the gentleman who sends that article understands by the "best classes." He measures them by dollars. He measures them by the amount of aggregated wealth they can pile up. And what has he, with the aid of his crew, done for the American people? They have built trust upon top of trust, until they are now impoverishing the laboring man whom they claim they are benefiting. Take the laboring man of the West, of whom he speaks. Those laboring men are coming forward to-day and saying to the railroads and manufacturers in the West, "We demand more pay, because through these trusts and syndicates we must pay more for everything we purchase, and our wages have not been raised. You have raised your prices on iron, on steel, on coal, and everything else you deal in except labor. Now we demand that you raise the price upon that."

They call that an agitation for the purpose of working up strikes. That is the logical evolution of the system. Another thing that is now a great public curse is the numerous trusts that are now permitted to throttle every legitimate industry. They are coming daily. I notice a very few days ago this item in a newspaper from a Western town where they have a broom factory.

Brooms, that a few weeks ago sold at wholesale at $3 per dozen, have now advanced to $4.50. The commercial travelers say that the broom-corn trust has bought up all the broom corn in the country and also all the seed. This trust even declines to sell seed unless the prospective grower promises to give the trust an option on the product he may raise next year.

I also received two letters this morning from leading newspaper publishers of my State, whose names I withhold because their letters are presumed to be private, but they so cogently state the facts that I shall adopt their statements:

DEAR SIR: Can not something be done to remove what one paper has aptly termed "a tax on intelligence?"

The tariff on white paper has enabled the paper trust to advance paper to where the newspapers are obliged to raise the price of subscriptions or suspend.

One year ago we bought paper at the Mississippi River or common points with Chicago for $1.55 in car lots. Now the best I can do is $2.70, and the paper houses freely predict that before the end of the year it will cost us $3.75. The only way the trust can be burst and paper reduced to where it was a year ago is to take off the tax.

The second one reads:

MY DEAR MR. BELL: In common with other publishers, we are ground down by the paper trust, which is forcing a raise in the price of subscription all over the country.

We have not raised our price, nor do we wish to do so; but the rate on paper is getting to be frightful.

If something could be done to take the tariff off of white print paper, the trust would collapse in a night, I believe.

The present tariff is, as I am informed and believe, $3 per ton, which enables the home manufacturer to throttle the papers. White paper dealers predict that it will go to 5 cents a pound before the end of the year.

It certainly looks to me as though the Government was levying a tax on intelligence.

Now, sir, I received another letter this morning from a leading citizen, who has just built a great sugar-refining plant in my district. He says to me:

I wish you would use your endeavors to see that sugar from Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the other islands does not come to our shores free. I wish you would see that this menial labor from these islands does not drive out the great sugar plant that we have built at Grand Junction.

I wrote back to him:

MY DEAR SIR: I will aid you all I can. I would like to see no product of the menial labor of those islands come in conflict with your labor, but without my consent and against my protest, as well as of others in this country, the Administration has gone forth; they have taken those islands; they have confiscated the sovereignty of the people.

They have made them, in other words, political slaves, and they can not have free access to the markets of the world nor the world to their markets, and if we cut them off on this side and cut them off on the other and suspend them between this and the Old World, then your pity for the reconcentrado ought to be doubled for the poor starving masses of Puerto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands." But there comes your appeals; they are coming from every part of the country; and I want to say to you that you may rightfully say to your laboring men that the necessary evolution of annexing or taking the sovereignty from these islands will be to bring the peoples of those islands in direct competition with your own industry, and not only that, they will be working side by side with your laborers.

Go out to-day on the western coast, and after you pass the line of Colorado what do you strike? You do not find the Americans working on the railroad grade or in the lumber camp. You do not find the Irish on the railroad grade. You find there the lowest type of Japanese. You find the Chinese. You do not even find Italians. That is past. The Japanese and South Sea Islanders can successfully compete with any Chinamen on the face of the earth.

Take them to-day. They are lining up on every railroad from the Colorado line to the western coast. We have kept them out of Colorado so far. But I saw there last fall, when a bridge was washed out, a white foreman who was the only American there, when they built up the bridge while we lay at Green River. They were all Japanese except the boss. That will be distributed to every portion of this country, as sure as things progress.

Now, another thing I wish to mention, and I have mentioned it often before this difficulty came up.

MR. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I want to agree that the gentleman's delivery is sufficiently free to satisfy. It is clearly rural; but it is very much of a strain on an ordinary mind to connect the subject discussed by the gentleman in his speech with the subject under consideration of the committee.

MR. BELL. I am on the general subject. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the whole expenditures of this Government, the Army and the Navy, the means of collecting revenue, and everything else is involved in this general deficiency bill. I think it is quite fair; if we have good free delivery, let us have something else free now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I started to say is this. I have made the point here twice before, and I hate to be repeating so often. I have introduced a bill into two Congresses and have been unable, seemingly, to get a report on it, and that is in its effect that this Government from the beginning has held that no man interested in a national banking association or in circulating or issuing currency was entitled to hold the position of Secretary of the Treasury. I have called your attention now twice during this Congress to that, and the only reason I call your attention to it again is to apply some things that have been occurring within the last few weeks.

Section 243 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

No Secretary of the Treasury shall directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be the owner in whole or in part of any sea vessels, or purchase by himself or another in trust for him any lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States.

National banking associations are all based upon national bonds, and they have notes issued on these bonds, and, as shown by Mr. WOLCOTT in the Senate, many of the bonds sold by the Treasury went into the banks in which the Secretary of the Treasury is interested. At every point along the line his private interest conflicts with his public duty, and it seems to me that not only public policy but the above statute ought to prohibit a person so interested from occupying this office.

Sections 324, 325, 326, and 327 of the United States Statutes provides:

The Comptroller of the Currency shall be appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he shall give a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office; and that it shall be unlawful for the Comptroller or the deputy, either directly or indirectly, to be interested in any association issuing national currency under the laws of the United States.

And provides that he shall perform his duties under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It would be absurd and ridiculous that the smaller officers should be prohibited from owning bank interests, and the Secretary who directs them, approves their bonds, recommends their appointment, and has full charge of them should be permitted to own such interest. The same reasons apply to both, but much stronger to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The press so understood that, and I observe that the party press of the present Secretary of the Treasury, when he was appointed, the papers of the great East, said it was very unusual to take a national banker and put him at the head of the Treasury. They said that a precedent had been set in the case of McCulloch. I noticed that at the time in some of the Philadelphia papers, and I saved the article, but I have not it here at present.

I notice again that recently the papers in New York, and especially the World, cite the statute that it is claimed prohibits him from occupying this place.

Now, I am not going to say one word against the personal character or the general character of our Secretary of the Treasury, but I say the last few weeks have demonstrated the fact that you can not afford to put a man in this high position whose personal interest is in conflict directly with his public duties.

You must bear in mind that we have contended from the beginning, and the people have contended from the foundation of this Government, that the most dangerous thing that could ever exist in a Republic, outside of a great standing army, was a great banking institution that could issue and control the currency, make it abundant at one time when it wanted to sell property and make it scarce at another when it might want to buy property, or to make money scarce when it wanted to coerce Congress or the legislature and make it bountiful if everything was harmonious. These principles have been ground into the people of the United States from the beginning.

Now, what have we had in the last few weeks? We have a Secretary of the Treasury letting to banks fifty and one hundred millions of public funds. What for? Gratuitously; and I want to say to you that it offers a direct premium to the banks of the country to organize a panic. It offers a direct premium to the bankers of New York to create a money panic. Why? Because this Treasurer of the United States walks in and fills the coffers with free money that they may lend it at a high rate of interest and thereby make the panic profitable to them.

Mr. HILL. If that is true, why is it that only 60 banks out of the 3,600 availed themselves of this privilege?

Mr. BELL. My dear sir, how many are able to comply with the conditions? That is one of the faults. It makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. That is the result of this policy. Now, take it in every State, practically, of this Union, 45 States and 3 Territories, and God only knows how many colonies [laughter], and what is the practice? The practice is for the treasurer of the State to go to the depositories and arrange for the use of the people's money, and they pay the interest on the people's money.

Take the Government of the United States, with its coffers of hundreds of millions and interest worth millions, and the great money centers get it all. You may make the rich richer and the powerful more powerful and the weak weaker.

Mr. BALL. If the gentleman will allow me, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut as to the number of banks that took advantage of the offer of the Secretary of the Treasury, I would suggest to the gentleman from Colorado that only those who owned or controlled the bonds were favored.

Mr. BELL. Certainly. The ordinary banks had no bonds and they could get no money. Now, your financial bill containing the funding scheme in the Senate is for the very purpose of enabling these men to get these bonds for the purpose of allowing the national banks to hold them as security. Everybody can not buy them. Everybody is not a bondholder. We can not all go into one business. I concede to the bondholder and to the banker every right and every good motive that I accord to myself; but I want to say that with their great power and prestige, and their organization of over sixty banks in the money centers, they control the destiny of the country.

Take the great bank of New York the other day, and when applying for funds it graciously reminded the Secretary of the Treasury that he knew what the institution did in the last campaign—held him up right there for the contribution they made—and that is why I say it is so dangerous to have a banker Secretary of the Treasury. Why? Because the idea that the banks should issue and control the currency is in every fiber of his being; because the banks ought not to issue or control the currency of the country. He is an adept at banking, but knows nothing about Government currency. He goes in with a prejudice in favor of letting the banks operate the whole financial policy of the Government.

And if you had a man who was versed, on the other hand, in Government currency, who was not an adept at manipulating public bonds for great private profits, he would say, "What is the best money for all the people?" And he would hold the banks within their just limits. Now, take a banker like our Secretary of the Treasury, who was president of the great Bankers' Association of the United States and president of one of the greatest banks of the country. Here is an associate of his interested back and forth in banking. They have been accustomed to deal with each other, and they are both elegant gentlemen unquestionably.

They deal with one another as bankers, evidently taking it for the best interests of the Government, while if a man was working for the Government alone he would be suggesting to Congress, "Here we have about $100,000,000 in these banks annually, only a few great banks in the money centers that get the use of this money. We pay them interest upon their bonds that lie in our Treasury. They let out our money, as was said by some of the other bankers of New York the other day, at an average of 6 per cent. Now, let them pay us 2 or 3 per cent."

Why, my friend, talk about your free delivery, if you will make the banks of the Government—the national banks—pay you 2 per cent upon all the money they hold longer than thirty days, it will give you funds enough to establish free-delivery routes all over this country, and it will be exacting only a just tribute. Why should they have your money for nothing? Why should these banks have fifty or a hundred million dollars of Government funds from day to day and month to month and throughout the year for nothing, when a private citizen has to pay for the use of every dollar he gets and when every dollar has a market value in every market of the United States? No one who does not look through the eye of a national banker see any reason or justice in the rule.

Not only that, but it congests your money in the great money centers. You take the great bank that got this money. Its stockholders represent untold millions in United States bonds. They gather them up from this man's investment and from that man's investment, from that rich widow's investment, and they lend them around, and they get fifteen or sixteen million dollars of the Government's funds, worth 6 per cent in the market throughout the year, for nothing, and it means millions of the people's money thrown in their coffers without money and without price.

Now, these are some of the things that I want to begin to see reformed, and not the pittance the farming community or that farming community may get out of this little item.

It seems passing strange that men in general always want to attack evils in some petty place. If one people by wholesale murders another or confiscates its ships, its goods, and its country, or if a great money king wrecks a great railroad or some other mammoth institution and takes it in at one fell swoop, it seems that the grand proportions of the crime and the audacity of the perpetrator so bedazzles and so awe-inspires the individual citizen that he is hypnotized and rendered incapable of seeing the turpitude involved.

Mr. Chairman, I believe as a member of the committee I have an hour. I beg pardon for having occupied so much time, and I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY] the balance of my time, ten minutes.

[Mr. RIDGELY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

During the reading of the foregoing the time of the gentleman from Kansas expired.

Mr. RIDGELY. I ask that the Clerk be allowed to read the remaining sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no control of the time.

Mr. RIDGELY. I ask that the remaining sentence or two be read, or that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] for ten minutes.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, the very large sum carried by this deficiency bill for the maintenance of the military arm of the Government greatly overshadows the comparatively small sum appropriated to extend the rural free delivery system in this country. The first runs into many millions, while the latter is counted by thousands, and yet nearly the entire day has been consumed in discussing the item carried in the bill for rural free delivery here, while little has been said about the appropriation to slaughter the Filipinos.

The expenses for rural free delivery for the past year have been about $300,000; to carry on the war in the Orient has cost about three hundred million.

Mr. Chairman, it is a long way from the scattered rural free-delivery experiments in this country to the seat of war in the Philippine Islands, but the distance is infinitesimal compared with the gulf which divides our own wars for liberty and the one we now wage to strike the liberty-loving spirit of our late allies to the earth, compared with the great departure we have made from the doctrines and sacrifices of the founders of this Republic to the carrying on of war in those islands without constitutional warrant or authority. In order to emphasize this departure I desire to have read at the desk of the Clerk that which will doubtless appear very antiquated doctrine to the Republican majority on the other side of this Chamber.

The Clerk read as follows:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of gentlemen on the other side I will state that the extract just read is from the Declaration of Independence. [Laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side.] I am glad that you recognize the document after the explanation. [Renewed laughter on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, when that document which is to that side of the Chamber, next to the Declaration of Independence, most nearly out of date was being discussed in the Pennsylvania convention, Mr. James Wilson gave expression to views touching the possibilities and objects of the Government then being established. Let the Clerk read.

The clerk read as follows:

James Wilson, in the Pennsylvania convention which adopted the Constitution, said:

"By adopting this system we shall probably lay a foundation for erecting temples of liberty in every part of the earth. It has been thought by many that on the success of the struggle America has made for freedom will depend the exertions of the brave and enlightened of other nations. The advantages resulting from this system will not be confined to the United States, but will draw from Europe many worthy characters who pant for the enjoyment of freedom. It will induce princes, in order to preserve their subjects, to restore to them a portion of that liberty of which they have for many years been deprived."

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, we had a great civil war in this country, which cost precious blood and untold treasure. The victors in that contest claimed to be waging a war to preserve the Union and establish universal liberty in this land. It may not be out of place here to quote from the oration of a great American, delivered upon the blood-stained heights of Gettysburg, in order to learn his conception of the purposes and end of our form of government. I send to the Clerk's desk this quotation.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, for the information of those upon the other side of the aisle, let me say the words read are from the address of Mr. Lincoln at Gettysburg. I commend them to you now.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. You press the button and we do the rest.

Mr. BALL. You can not "do the rest" as he would have you. You have departed so far from the memory, faith, and practice of Abraham Lincoln that were his embodied spirit to return now it would be as a stranger, and his doctrines addressed to you and your side would fall upon deaf ears were he to come from the dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a long step from Abraham Lincoln and his tenets to the present Administration and its policies; and yet so late as the outbreak of the war with Spain his teachings had not fallen upon barren ground, and patriotic thought and action was not a stranger to our President and his party. I quote from President McKinley's message:

Of the untried measures there remain only: Recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; recognition of the independence of Cuba; neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That by our code of morality would be criminal aggression.

How then stood Congress, which voted without dissent $50,000,000 to prepare for war? Let the resolutions voted for by Democrats and Republicans alike speak for themselves:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Then we went to war. Who will deny that we thereby recognized the rights of liberty-loving people to an independent government of their own choosing, and that it was not our purpose to wage a war of conquest or for annexation of territory? We published to the world the holiness of our purpose in waging a war for "human liberty based upon human rights." That "forcible annexation" or "criminal aggression" was not our purpose we pledged our nation's faith. We consecrated this pledge by the splendid heroism and sacrifice of our soldiers and sailors who carried our flag to glorious victory upon land and sea.

But, Mr. Chairman, before the smoke of battle had cleared away the bony fingers of greed and avarice began to reach out to throttle unto death the nation's faith and tarnish the luster of American valor and patriotism. The rich fields of Cuba caught the eyes of syndicates and speculators as a promising vineyard for plunder. Garcia, Gomez, and their compatriots were pronounced thieves and assassins and the Spaniards declared to be the best citizens of that island.

But, Mr. Chairman, men such as Fitzhugh Lee, General Wood, and General Wilson were not lost to American honor and Cuban rights. They declare the Cubans to be the best citizens of the island and assert their capacity for self-government.

While our pledges to Cuba have not been carried out as yet, let us assume that they will be and that the powerful agencies, avaricious hands, and capacious maws which stand between the President and the American people may yet be defeated in their nefarious schemes. The situation in the far Orient is fraught with far greater danger. There we summoned the Filipinos to our aid against the common enemy. To say that they were not our allies and were not so treated is to stultify ourselves. If we believed that the people of Cuba were entitled to their freedom as a matter of right, were not the Filipinos also? If we disclaimed any intentions to rob the Cubans of their country, which was more nearly controlled by the Spaniards when we went to war than was the Philippine Archipelago when Manila fell, what right had we to rob the Filipinos, who were our allies, of their country?

The truth is that unholy greed saw an opening in that unhappy land to line plutocratic pockets, regardless of what it cost the American people in blood and treasure. Witness the gradual surrender of President McKinley, who started out with such high purpose. The Paris commission was instructed, first, to demand only the island of Luzon; finally, in council with the enemy, where our allies, the Filipinos, were denied an audience, we bought for $20,000,000 the sovereignty which Spain once partially owned, but had wholly lost.

Men quibble now in puerile fashion as to where the responsibility rests for the outbreak of hostilities.

Mr. Chairman, every honest man who is well informed knows that this war was caused by the determination of President McKinley's Administration to forcibly annex the Philippine Islands without the consent of its people. If it would have been "criminal aggression" and "contrary to our code of morals" to take such action in Cuba, have we a different code of morals for islands and peoples in the far east? Sir, when the Fifty-fifth Congress adjourned not five Republican members of this House would admit that they favored the acquisition and forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands. Now we have entered upon a new era, a wonderful transition has taken place that might be aptly called the EVOLUTION OF IMPERIALISM.

Those who love liberty less than they love gold appear to be in the saddle. Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, and Lincoln no longer impress, through their lives, tenets, and memories, those charged with the administration of affairs. Like the Declaration of Independence and Constitution of the United States, they are out of date and no longer to be followed. Contrast, if you will, the extracts I have quoted from the Declaration of Independence, the debate on the adoption of the Constitution, the oration of Mr. Lincoln, and the words of President McKinley to Congress before the war with Spain with the utterances of the new and breezy young man from the West, as the spokesman of the Administration at the other end of the Capitol, if you would learn the greatness of our fall. Hear the brutal frankness of the "advance agent of imperialism" contained in the resolutions offered by Mr. BEVERIDGE in the Senate of the United States:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

No hope for independence there; no promise of possible freedom; no guaranty of constitutional government; no expression to indicate whether it shall be military government, a colonial system, a despotism, or a monarchy; nothing to indicate that it is not our intention to extend the polygamous and slave-owning system recognized by the President in the agreement with the Sultan of Sulu to the entire Philippine group.

Goread the utterances of the young Senator in his entire speech, which is throughout an appeal to "sordid greed." Until I read this speech I was at a loss to know why any sane man wanted the islands, either from the standpoint of government as a commercial proposition or from the standpoint of the laboring classes, who will be thrown into competition with millions of laborers working for the lowest possible wages. Since reading the speech I know why the Republican party wants the islands. The Senator interviewed a number of people over there. Listen to some he quoted:

A highly educated and bright Spanish mestizo, claiming to be pure Filipino, employed in Iloilo, said:

"No one can tell when the fighting will cease. It all depends upon what Aguinaldo says. The common people have absolute faith in him. His order among those now in rebellion in this island would be promptly obeyed. The common people say they are fighting for their independence. They mean by this the right to manage their own government; make and execute their own laws. Their ideas of a proper relation between the Philippine Islands and people of the United States is that of a protectorate. The leaders absolutely control the people. A man of property expects his working people to have the same opinion as he has. I do myself."

A rich planter of Panay, pure Filipino, but moderate in views, said:

"The common people have no opinions and are not capable of voting. If the Filipinos established a government, of course the property and educated class would, beyond doubt, run such government. Not more than 25 per cent of the people are fitted to take part in the selection of public officers. The people are at present incapable of self-government, though they might be intrusted with purely municipal affairs. Establish precisely the same laws through the archipelago. English should be universally taught. The common people know and care nothing about self-government or any other government. They are principally interested in simply living. Self-government can only mean government by the upper classes."

Pure Filipino and large planter of Negros:

"I have working for me about 400 men. They are good, average examples of the common people of the island. I should say that not over 3 or 4 per cent of them are capable of self-government or in any true sense understand the term. If the ballot were given them, or even if it were restricted to those 3 or 4 per cent, I should expect them to vote as the leaders might indicate. I think the English language should be immediately adopted throughout the entire archipelago. It would simplify matters incalculably. No, I do not believe the same laws should prevail everywhere. We of Negros are more cultivated than in Panay. We deserve better laws."

Prominent Filipino of Cebu:

"The island of Cebu can yield greatly more than it has. The people are disturbed by what they have been through and what they fear. Very few are capable of self-government now. My brother employs a large number of men. If given the ballot they would most certainly vote as he said. I am sure the better classes would control the voting of the poorer classes. We should expect to hold positions under any government you establish."

Pablo Majia, pure Filipino, rich, able, honest, and moderate. He was stabbed to death in Cebu, and this is why I withhold the names of the others: "I am sorry to say that very few of our population are capable of self-government. Of course the wealthy and educated classes are entirely competent to run the government. I do not expect nor desire any government except one founded on and directed by America. Oh, yes; to such extent as the ballot may be given there is no doubt that we of the upper class can control. I employ 100 men now; in good times more. All these would vote as I say."

Mr. Chairman, now we have solved the problem of Republican desire for these islands. The conditions there, from interviews quoted with such gusto by the Senator from Indiana, are such that the so-called upper classes, composing 3 or 4 per cent of the population would control, hold the offices, and vote their laborers blindly. There you find an ideal field for latter-day Republicanism. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet, Mr. Chairman, Pablo Majia, whom the Senator pronounces rich, able, honest, and moderate, and all the others, were traitors to their own country, as much as were the Tories of the Revolutionary war, and merited ostracism as much as did they.

Mr. Chairman, the Indiana Senator, speaking for the President, was even less frank than the great newspaper published here, which disdains to shelter itself behind pretended patriotism and providential responsibility. I refer to the following editorial from the Washington Post:

LET US BE HONEST.

Why can not we be honest in our utterances touching the territories we have recently acquired? Really it would save time and trouble, to say nothing of life and treasure, to come out frankly with the announcement that we have annexed these possessions in cold blood and that we intend to utilize them to our profit and advantage. All this talk about benevolent assimilation; all this hypocritical pretense of anxiety for the moral, social, and intellectual exaltation of the natives; all this transparent parade of responsibility and deep-seated purpose; all this deceives nobody, avails nothing, helps us not an inch in the direction of profit, dignity, and honor. We all know down in our hearts that these islands, groups, etc., are important to us only in the ratio of their practical possibilities. We value them by the standard of their commercial usefulness, and by no other. All this gabble about civilizing and uplifting the benighted barbarians of Cuba and Luzon is mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Foolishly or wisely, we want these newly acquired territories, not for any missionary or altruistic purposes, but for the trade, the commerce, the power, and the money there are in them. Why beat about the bush and promise and protest all sorts of things? Why not be honest? It will pay.

As a matter of fact, we are not concerned in the ethical or religious uplifting of the Filipinos. After all, the difference between a breach cloth and a starched shirt front is a mere matter of climate and personal opinion. Dishonesty, untruth, crime, and general wickedness are here in our midst—present with us as part of our daily life and growing with our growth. We need not go to the West Indies or the Philippines in search of material for moral rescue. Our own slums abound with opportunities for missionary zeal. Why not tell the truth and say—what is the fact—that we want Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Luzon, together with any other islands in either ocean that may hereafter commend themselves to our appetite, because we believe they will add to our national strength, and because we hope they will some day become purchasers at our bargain counters? We might as well throw off the pious mask and indulge ourselves in a little honest candor. It will cost us nothing, and it may profit much. At any rate, we shall have the comfort and satisfaction of being honest with ourselves and the privilege of looking into the mirror without blushing.

I commend this editorial as the true and only reason for the policy now pursued. Had we given the Filipinos assurance, as we gave the Cubans, there would have been no war with them. Were satisfactory assurances of honest purposes given them now they would lay down their arms.

Mr. Chairman, while I honor our brave men fighting under orders in a distant clime for our flag, I do not honor those whose sordid policy and disregard for the ancient faith, sheltered from danger themselves, are compelling "the bravest of the brave" to fall victims to tropical disease and Filipino bullets. What a culmination to the peace conference called by the Czar of Russia—the two great English-speaking nations of the world, Great Britain and the United States, carrying on oriental wars against the Boers and Filipinos, struggling for their liberty!

We have come to the "parting of the ways." The American people are to choose between the government set out in the resolutions of Mr. BEVERIDGE and the purposes plainly set forth by the Washington Post, backed by the Republican party, and the government declared for in the Declaration of Independence and prayed for by Mr. Lincoln.

There is yet opportunity for us to follow in the "paths our fathers trod." May we find courage to turn aside from glittering dreams of world-wide empire, and hold fast to the old Republic which has survived the shock of foreign and civil war, worthy that which our fathers hoped and taught. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the "war-revenue law" be repealed or even reasonably modified at this session of Congress? This law was passed and approved June 13, 1898, now more than a year and a half ago, and was intended to meet the emergency of a war with Spain. When it was under consideration it will be remembered that we on this side of the Chamber protested against many of its features and contended that it imposed unnecessary burdens upon the people. We asserted our belief that the war would be a short one and that the bill carried too much taxation for so brief a struggle as we were likely to have. The lamented Mr. Dingley, then the Republican leader of the House and the chairman of the committee which reported this measure, said, in reply:

But it is evident that the war upon which we have entered, unless all signs fail, as I hope they may, is not to be simply a sixty days' affair, is not to be simply a three months' affair, is not to be even a six months' affair, and the more earnest we are in our preparations, the more united we stand, the more means we provide for defense and offense, the more we arm the Government with the means of carrying on this war, the shorter it will be.

In point of fact, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fears of the distinguished gentleman whose language I have just quoted, the war proved to be "simply a sixty days' affair," or, at best, so far as actual hostilities are concerned, "simply a three months' affair."

Let me quote from another very distinguished gentleman of the majority who engaged in that memorable debate. I allude to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In reply to the objection raised by Democrats against the bond feature of the bill, he said, April 29, 1898:

Not one dollar will be raised by taxation; not one dollar will be raised by borrowing, except as it is needed. If the war ends in six months, as the gentleman from Kentucky thinks it will, then we shall be in a position six months from now to repeal this taxation.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, this language was uttered on this floor more than a year and a half ago. The war ended in less than six months, "as the gentleman from Kentucky" thought it would, and the country is interested in knowing now whether we are "in a position to repeal this taxation" or even to reasonably modify it.

I quote again from another very distinguished member of the majority. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who succeeded to the leadership after the death of the lamented Mr. Dingley and who became and is now chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, on April 29, 1898, used this language:

The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that we provide here for a set of bonds that would be payable in three years, because, he says, he wants to continue these war taxes and pay these bonds. The proposition of the committee is that when the war is over we cut off the war taxes [applause], and that we pay the bonds as we paid the bonds of the late war—out of the usual and ordinary taxes of the Government.

And so I might go on culling from that debate other assurances, equally as pointed and unequivocal, made by other gentlemen on that side of the House, that with the end of the war, unless its magnitude should be unexpectedly great, would end war taxes. It had all along been the proud boast of Republican members that the "Dingley tariff act" would soon supply all needed revenues, and so, if we had only a short war, we should need no excessive war taxes.

War was formally declared on April 25, and on May 1 Dewey paralyzed Spain and startled the world with his unprecedented victory at Manila. On July 3 Spain's remaining fleet went down before the guns of Schley and Sampson at Santiago. Then came the intrepid charge up San Juan Hill and the surrender of the Spanish army. A few days more and Miles had marched across Puerto Rico. Spain capitulated, and on August 12, 1898, preliminary terms of peace were agreed upon. Our warships came to anchor and our armies were commanded to halt.

It appears, therefore, that when the "war-revenue bill" was passed the conflict for which we were preparing was already half over. That the final and exact terms of peace were not agreed upon and ratified by the belligerents until a latter date, that peace commissions were slower in coming to terms from a diplomatic point of view than our soldiers and sailors had been in achieving victory on land and sea, makes little difference. The war was over when the swords were sheathed and the guns had ceased to roar. There has been a session of Congress since then, and we heard no suggestion of even a modification of the war tax. Congress is again in session; do we hear any suggestion of a modification or repeal now?

A SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY.

We have an abundance of money in the Treasury. The voters were told in the recent election in some of the States that all this was because of excellent Republican financial management. Very recently we found ourselves with so much surplus money and with so little immediate use for it that we "relieved the distress in financial circles" by anticipating, discounting, and paying interest on our bonded indebtedness long in advance of its maturity. As long ago as October last the Washington Post contained an interview with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, from which I take this extract:

"The Treasury is in a position to undertake very readily the prepayment of all the interest due during this fiscal year, large as is that amount," said Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Vanderbilt yesterday. "The cash balance is an extraordinarily large one, being now nearly $200,000,000. It was larger than this a year ago, but we were then just receiving the payments for the $200,000,000 war loan. Our cash balance now, however, is far larger than it has averaged for many years, and if receipts continue to bear anything like so favorable a relation to expenditures as they have recently it promises to be still larger instead of being reduced."

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, tells us that—

The transactions of the fiscal year, as shown by the report of the Treasurer of the United States, were of unusual magnitude, the net ordinary receipts having been exceeded in any like period but once, in 1866, and the net ordinary expenditures but thrice, in 1863, 1864, and 1865. Inclusive of the amounts involved in the issue and redemption of bonds, notes, and certificates, the gross receipts, under warrant, were $1,038,451,340.18, and the gross expenditures $946,222,148.83. There was, in consequence, an addition of $92,229,191.35 to the general Treasury balance, which increased from $78,751,398.11 to $677,980,539.46. These operations were conducted through the offices of the Treasury, numbering 10; those of the mint, increased during the year from 11 to 12, and the depositary banks, of which there were 172 at the beginning of the year and 357 at the close. The aggregate of money handled by the Treasury offices alone was $2,969,199,747 in the receipts and $2,371,283,629 in the disbursements.

While there was a deficiency of $89,111,539.67 in the ordinary revenues, the excess of receipts over disbursements on account of loans was sufficient to realize a net surplus of $100,791,321.35 as the result of the fiscal operations of the year. This substantial addition to the available resources, together with the steady advance of the receipts from taxation to an actual excess over current needs, has relieved the Treasury of all danger of difficulty from sudden emergency. Nor was the growth of the available cash balance, which stood at $24,488,516.20 at the close of the year, more wholesome than the improvement in the character of the assets, which were converted into gold as far as statutory and other limitations would permit.

Within the last few days the Secretary of the Treasury, in his reply to resolutions passed by Congress calling on him for information, again tells us that money is rapidly accumulating in the Treasury from the operation of the revenue law. The country has been assured time and time again that the Dingley tariff law was adequate to the easy support of the Government. This assurance was given when the law was passed and it was repeated on this floor during the discussion of the war-revenue bill. It was said that if peace conditions had continued the ordinary revenues of the Government would, in a short time, have been in excess of the expenditures.

One enthusiastic member of the majority [Mr. BROWN of Ohio] said:

In fact, during the months of February and March of the present year (1898) our revenues exceeded our expenditures by the sum of about $3,000,000, and it is as good as certain that if peace conditions had continued we would now be in the early days of a period wherein our revenues would equal and, indeed, exceed our expenditures. The tariff of July 24, 1897, has already justified the hopes of its friends. As a measure for producing revenue needed for all the wants of the Government in time of peace, that act is already an established and undisputed success.

NOT AN EXPANSIONIST.

Mr. Speaker, I am not an expansionist. I deplore the spirit of expansion. I regret that this new idea of extending our territory beyond the seas has crept into the minds of many of my countrymen. I fear its final consequences to our republican institutions. It was the undoubted purpose of the founders of this Republic to plant here on these shores, between the two great oceans, a government of free people, a government of the people, a government ever under the control of the people.

It was the evident purpose of our fathers that our Government should be made free and be kept free from foreign alliances and foreign complications. Under that policy we have prospered as no people ever prospered. We have grown great and rich and strong. But great and rich and strong as we are, our country is yet undeveloped. We have rich valleys yet untitled, mountains whose treasures are yet unopened, streams that yet turn no wheel. Why should we turn away from the course through which we have prospered and are prospering to follow new and untried ways which lead whither we know not?

STAND BY OUR SOLDIERS.

But, though I am not an expansionist, though I deplore the evident purpose of the Administration and the great party behind the Administration to make the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico integral parts of our Government, and thereby possibly, and even probably, change the whole aim and purpose of our patriot fathers, I still would not for all the world withhold from our brave soldiers now struggling, bleeding, and dying in the Philippines all possible support, moral and financial. If we need the money derived from the operation of this war-revenue law to support our soldiers, then let the law stand. The people will pay these taxes un murmuringly and gladly.

DO WE NEED THE TAXES?

But do we need the taxes? I have already shown that we have more money now in the Treasury than we need, and it is accumulating more and more day by day. It is accumulating there because of the operation of an extraordinary tax law, made to carry on a war with a foreign power, which war is long since over. It is evidently not needed for the suppression of the "insurrection" in the archipelago, because it is not all being used for that purpose. It is accumulating or being used to anticipate interest on Government bonds. Money is being piled up in the Treasury and taken out of circulation. Are you piling it there because you need it or merely that you may boast, during the approaching political campaign, of the splendid financing of the Republican party? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time has this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been twenty-seven minutes more used on this side of the House than on the other side.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time have we remaining on this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred and twenty-five minutes have been consumed by the Democratic side and ninety-eight minutes on the other side.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have twenty-one minutes remaining, then, to my credit, and I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee as much as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is mistaken; he will have sixteen minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-three minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Georgia generously yielded to me, and I will yield back to him his own time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Thank you. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention for a moment to something of the expense made necessary by the condition of affairs we are in, brought about by the Republican legislation in order to maintain the military establishment of this country for the present fiscal year. As I understand it, this appropriation bill carries a deficiency for the military establishment of $47,602,082.61. Now, of course, to this deficiency should be added an amount already heretofore appropriated and expended, which I understand to be $75,247,811.

The two sums when added together make the enormous sum of $121,000,000 in round numbers, to be necessary, in the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, and not controverted, it seems, by any gentleman on the floor on either side of the House. The enormous sum of $121,000,000 is said to be necessary for the maintenance of the military establishment of this country in a time of peace. It is not improper to ask, Whither are we drifting, Mr. Chairman? It seems we are to spend one hundred and forty-odd million dollars year by year for pensions, and then by reason of the policy of the Republican party we are to expend $121,000,000 to meet the military expenses of this Government. I take the time now only to call attention to this fact.

I also want to speak upon another matter and shall not address myself further at this time to the items in this bill. It is well known to the House and to the country that recently the management of the Treasury of the United States has been challenged by some of the great papers and by many of the thinking people of this country. I am not inclined to join in a wanton attack upon public officers. I do not believe that that kind of attack ought to be encouraged.

I believe as a general thing public officers of either party are inclined to be honest, that they put forward the best efforts they have and use all their capacity and ability to administer the affairs of great offices which are committed to their hands. So, I say, I would not join in a mere partisan attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer clothed with a great public trust. But certain facts have been developed, and certain information has been sent to Congress by reason of a resolution of inquiry, and I deem it not out of the way to call the attention of this House and the attention of the country to some of those facts.

I know it has been charged that the Secretary of the Treasury has publicly and openly violated the section of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows:

Every officer or other person charged by any act of Congress with the safe-keeping of the public moneys who fails to safely keep the same without depositing in banks or exchanging for other funds than as specially allowed by law shall be guilty of embezzlement of the money so deposited or exchanged, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than ten years, and fined in a sum of money equal to the amount so embezzled.

It has been charged also in some of the great newspapers of the country that the Secretary of the Treasury is guilty of embezzlement, and that he should be impeached by this House. I am not going to that extent. In fact, I do not think it is necessary to do it. The matter to which I call attention specifically is the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the sale of the custom-house property in the city of New York. The sale of this property was by authority of an act of Congress approved March 2, 1899. He was authorized to sell this property at not less than $3,000,000 and to deposit the net proceeds of sale in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property. This act of Congress contains, among other things, the following provisions:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale, to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets, and Exchange place, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property; and in case of such sale the Secretary of Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and such sale shall be subject to such right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept the said purchase price in several payments, from time to time, as he may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made.

SEC. 5. That the appropriation of $750,000, made in section 1 of this act, in addition to the balance in the Treasury remaining unexpended under the provisions of the act of Congress approved September 14, 1888, for the acquisition of the Bowling Green site, and the further sum of $1,000,000 for the preparation of plans and the commencement of the work of construction, appropriated in section 2 of this act, shall be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sale of the present custom-house property, provided for in section 4 of this act, when such proceeds have been covered into the Treasury.

Now, it is well known to us that recently a resolution of inquiry was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury and certain information called for in respect to this sale of the custom-house property and some other matters, such as the depositing of public moneys in national banks. In answer to that resolution, which only covered a few lines, the Secretary of the Treasury has made answer, and I hold his answer in my hand, a document covering 848 printed pages. It may have been necessary for him to make his answer in

But inasmuch as the matter has been followed up by a gentleman on this floor by the introduction of a further resolution of inquiry, and while that resolution is pending before one of the committees of the House, I do not intend to enter into a discussion of what might be discovered or brought to light by that investigation, if one is ordered, or what is developed by the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury as to that part of the resolution of inquiry which relates to the handling of the public moneys and the depositing of the internal-revenue receipts in the national banks of this country.

I say I will not discuss that feature of the object of the inquiry, because if there is an investigation, it will be time enough to do so after the facts are fully developed by that investigation.

But this one feature, to which I propose to devote a few moments, is covered fully by the Secretary of the Treasury in his answer now before us, and that is the sale of the custom-house property in the city of New York. Inasmuch as his answer covers this action upon his part, I take it that possibly it would not be necessary to further investigate that one item or matter. Therefore it is legitimate now to comment upon the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to it.

I say I would not encourage a wanton assault upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and I am willing to have the admission made for the purposes of this argument that he has not violated the strict letter of the law in his handling of the proceeds of the sale of that custom-house property. It may not be known to every gentleman how this sale was made by the Secretary. He made the sale on the 3d day of July, 1899. The law which authorized him to make that sale provided a minimum price at which the property should be sold, and that minimum was $3,000,000. He had very full discretion as to the sale.

Mr. BERRY. What did he get for it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The property was sold on the 3d day of July, 1899, for $3,265,000, to the National City Bank of New York.

Mr. GAINES. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. And that was $40,000 less than it cost.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Three million two hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars was the purchase price. I say it is charged by some that he is guilty of embezzlement of this money, technically, under section 5940 of the Revised Statutes, because according to his own statement he did not deposit this money directly in the Treasury of the United States, but did deposit it in the bank to which he had sold it, the contention being that the depositing of this money in that bank, which was a United States depository in the city of New York, was not depositing it in the Treasury.

I have seen it stated in some of the papers that the Supreme Court of the United States, as recently as last November, held that a deposit by an officer of the Government of public money in a national bank which was a depository was not a deposit or a payment into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment right there. Does the gentleman state that that deposit in one of the national banks that was a Government depository was not in compliance with the law?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, I do not say that. I say, let it be conceded that that is not embezzlement, properly speaking. Let it be conceded that under the law he had the right to deposit it in that bank. I want to come to what occurred. As I understand the decision of last November—the style of the case being Coudert, executor, vs. The United States, which has been quoted in some of the newspapers—it is assumed that it was decided by Justice McKenna, of the Supreme Court, that a public officer could not deposit money which he had collected—public money—in a national bank which was a depository, and when sued for the money, the bank having failed, plead that he had deposited the money in the Treasury of the United States. As I understand that decision—

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should be very glad to have the gentleman refer more definitely to that decision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have the decision here and will do so.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman wishes to know exactly what was decided, I can refer him to the page.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know exactly what it decided.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not as intimated, however. There is nothing in the decision like what the gentleman has intimated.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What intimation did I make?

Mr. HEPBURN. You intimated this. You used this as an illustration: You said the Supreme Court had decided that an officer could not deposit public moneys in a national depository.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I say that is what this case decides. Mr. HEPBURN. But it decided that that was not public money.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I must decline to yield. I say this, Mr.

Chairman: The decision is just as I have stated. The officer who deposited this money in the case cited by me was a marshal. He had sold certain property of the United States. He had deposited the money to his own credit in a depository, and when that depository failed and he undertook to acquit himself, the Supreme Court said that was not depositing the money in the Treasury of the United States. That is what this case decides, and I say when gentlemen make the claim against the Secretary that he had no right to deposit that money in a national depository, they are not sustained by this decision of Justice McKenna.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to get up a controversy, because I am trying to say that the Secretary of the Treasury is not guilty of embezzlement under this decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HEPBURN. But the court held in that case that it was not public money; that that was money within the custody of the court; that the marshal, an officer of the court, had deposited it there, and therefore it was not public money.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no controversy between us on that. I am saying that the Secretary of the Treasury is not guilty of embezzlement under this decision. Now, that is all you want me to say, I take it. That is what I do say. I am not seeking to hold the Secretary of the Treasury guilty of embezzlement under this decision, because the decision does not sustain such contention.

Mr. SULZER rose.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will not the gentleman go a step further and say what the law is—that the Secretary of the Treasury having deposited that money in that national bank, which was a Government depository, he was complying with the strict letter as well as the spirit of the law?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is it that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] desires?

Mr. SULZER. I want to say that in the act for the sale of the custom-house property in New York City it was specifically provided that that money should be paid into the Treasury and not into a national bank.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is paid into the Treasury when it is paid into a Government depository.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I decline to yield further, because there is no controversy between the gentleman from Iowa or from Illinois and myself. I say that under that decision, under the last utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject, the Secretary of the Treasury, in my judgment, would not have been guilty of a violation of the law if he deposited this money in the City National Bank of New York, it being a Government depository.

Now, what more can I say upon that? I know, as my friend from New York [Mr. SULZER] says, that he was required to cover the money into the Treasury; but I say this decision last November of Mr. Justice McKenna does not decide that he did not cover this money into the Treasury when he put it into a depository in the city of New York. Justice McKenna's opinion does not make the Secretary of the Treasury an embezzler or violator of the law, because it may be that if the Secretary of the Treasury puts money into a public depository—a national bank which is a public depository—to his own credit and which he can check out at pleasure, he has complied with the law. Now, that is all any of you contend for.

But I want to go beyond that. There is more in the Secretary's action than this. What is this transaction, Mr. Chairman? On the 3d of July the Secretary of the Treasury, by the authority and power vested in him by law, undertook to sell, and did sell, the custom-house property in the city of New York for $3,265,000. Now, sir, just before he did that, the Secretary of the Treasury received a letter from one A. B. Hepburn, vice-president of the National City Bank of New York, and I propose to quote about three lines of that letter, because it bears upon the subsequent action of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to ask for time, but I would like to have a few minutes if the House will indulge me. Has the gentleman from Georgia any further time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think I have some.

The CHAIRMAN. All the time remaining belongs to the other side of the House—forty-three minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield the gentleman some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give some time to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BINGHAM. If I have any time, I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have ten minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Assuming that I have the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS], I yield five minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can hardly get through in five minutes. I should like to have ten.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very, well; go on; I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, then, what Mr. Hepburn wrote the Secretary of the Treasury on the 5th day of June is shown by the following letter:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.
New York, June 5, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any changes which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect.

We should like to remain a United States depository as at present. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. HEPBURN.

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE.

United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, mark these words:

Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take pains to look at the list of our directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Now, here is the letter of Mr. Hepburn, vice-president of the National City Bank, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for assistance for his bank, based upon what they, the directors of his bank, did for the Republican party in 1896.

At that time there was deposited in this National City Bank only a small sum of Government money. The amount on the 14th of May, which is before this letter was written, it is charged and not denied, was only $200,000. Mr. Chairman, I must hurry along. After that date, and not very long afterwards, in the same year, the National City Bank received of the $58,000,000 paid in the settlement of the Union Pacific debt $24,000,000 on deposit. On July 14, 1898, the balance of the Government money deposited without interest in the National City Bank, it is charged and not denied, was $19,579,000.

On September 20, 1899, likewise, the balance was $29,000,000. In the floating of the war loan of $200,000,000 in June, 1898, in which 348 banks participated, the National City Bank received $14,000,000. On July 8, 1898, the balance was $10,500,000, showing that the bank had the free use of over $10,000,000 for six months. Very soon after this appeal made by Mr. Hepburn to Mr. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, for help, the deposits of public money rapidly increased in this bank.

On the 3d day of July the custom-house property was sold, and very soon thereafter we find that Mr. Hepburn, acting for his bank, called upon Secretary Gage for authority to deposit with the Treasury United States bonds, in order that he might pay the purchase price of this property by a simple credit of the amount of the purchase price on the bank's books. It did deposit, we are told, $3,865,000 of Government bonds with the Treasury.

These bonds, of course, were bearing interest to the bank. What followed? Instead of paying $3,265,000, the purchase price of the property, the Secretary says he simply required the bank to give him a credit on its books for $3,215,000, leaving only the pitiful sum of $50,000 unpaid. He allowed the bank to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury $3,865,000 of bonds, on which it was to get interest, leaving as a deposit with the bank $3,215,000, a portion of the purchase price, which sum the bank could put at interest, and then turned around immediately and rented from the bank the same property which he had sold to it, agreeing to pay the bank a rental for the property, a sum equal to 4 per cent of the purchase price. Here it is not inappropriate to inquire, What, by this juggling, did the bank get, and what did the Treasury get?

The Treasury got nothing except the deposit on paper of the $3,215,000, a mere credit on the bank's books. What did the bank get? It had deposited bonds upon which it got 4 or 5 per cent interest, or whatever the interest is on the bonds. It kept the money, $3,215,000—the purchase price—in its own vaults, which they doubtless loaned at any rate of interest they could get, and I am told by the public press that during the late panic banks in New York loaned money as high as 100 per cent.

Mr. SULZER. One hundred and eighty per cent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One hundred and eighty per cent. They kept the $3,215,000 in the bank, and did not turn it over to the United States Treasury except in so far as that bank as a public depository is the Treasury; and then turned round immediately and charged the Treasury of the United States, or the Government of the United States, rent for the use and occupation of this property for which it had not paid a dollar.

Mr. SULZER. And left taxes to be paid to the State of New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not only that, but they left unpaid $50,000, as the correspondence shows, in order not to pass the title to the bank and make it liable for taxes to the State and city of New York.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have got but a moment, am talking rapidly, and I can not yield. I am stating the facts. The only object, if I can understand the matter, in holding back the $50,000 was, as stated in this correspondence, that the title would not pass from the Government to this National City Bank. That is, that the title would not pass until the entire purchase money was paid. What reason was there for holding back that pitiful sum of $50,000 when they took the credit for $3,215,000? They paid no money. Why not take credit for all the purchase price—$3,265,000? The inference is clear, and part of the correspondence of the bank shows that they said, "We do not want to begin to pay taxes on this property until you pass the title."

The agreement was that the title was not to be passed until all the purchase money was paid. Therefore, by an agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury, this bank that was appealing for help because of the money its officers had paid to the Republican campaign fund in 1896 was exempted from paying fifty or sixty thousand dollars to the city and State of New York for taxes. The Government sells the property and gets no money for it, but simply a transfer of credit on paper, and the bank reserves the money in its vault and loans it out at any rate of interest it can get and then charges the Government 4 per cent on the purchase money for the use and occupation of this very property. Now, I ask, and I want to know if any fair-minded man, even the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who has just risen to confront me with a question—if he will stand up here and say that is dealing properly with trust money of the United States? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee know that from the time the bank leased this property to the Government it will be responsible for the taxes?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; the contention is that they are not liable for the taxes so long as the title remains in the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. The title has passed when they leased the property.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The title has not passed.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg your pardon. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. How could they lease property the title to which they did not have? The mere fact that the deed had not been made would make no difference; the bank would be responsible for the taxes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then by your own statement you have got your Secretary of the Treasury liable to impeachment in this House and before the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will tell you why.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I decline to yield further. I say you have made him liable, because he says in this letter that he did agree to pay the bank a rental equal to 4 per cent on the purchase price from the date of the sale. You say he did not have to do it unless the bank had the title. He says the title was not passed to the bank, and by your own reasoning he did what was unlawful and for which he ought to be impeached. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to engage in this discussion, and I should not had the gentleman from Tennessee who has just addressed the committee drawn fair inferences from the facts presented by him. The Secretary of the Treasury can meet any facts in connection with this transaction, and they show that his conduct has been honest and fair, and that he has shown great ability in looking out for the interests of the Government of the United States. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

He could not provide against the insinuations, dishonest in my judgment, that are hurled against him by the gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber. The gentleman says that under the statement that I made the Secretary of the Treasury is liable to impeachment. I deny it, and any man who has a thimble full of brains or any knowledge of law ought to know better than to make a statement of that character.

Mr. Chairman, my statement was predicated upon the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that the bank would not be required to pay taxes upon this property until the deed was passed. I undertook to call his attention to the fact that the moment that the bank took possession of the custom-house under the contract of sale and executed a lease to the Government of the United States, the mere fact that the paper deed had not been made would make no difference so far as its title to the property was concerned, and its liability to pay taxes to the city of New York and to the State of New York.

The deed is not the sale. It is only an evidence of such sale. Possession and acts of ownership, such as the execution of a lease of the custom-house, is also evidence of purchase and ownership. And for that reason the argument that the gentleman has made, that the Government of the United States has been paying interest at 4 per cent upon the purchase price of a piece of property when the title was still in the Government of the United States, falls to the ground, at least among gentlemen who know anything about legal transactions. Now, sir, anybody who has read—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not, Mr. Chairman, now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman declined to yield to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yielded to you for a question. Does the gentleman from Illinois decline to yield? All right.

Mr. HOPKINS. I decline to yield. Now, I say this answer of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is here in the possession of every member of this House, exonerates the Secretary of the Treasury from any misconduct whatever.

Mr. SULZER. On the contrary, it is a confession.

Mr. HOPKINS. It shows, Mr. Chairman, that this bank was selected as a Government depository long before the present Secretary of the Treasury held the high position which he now honors. It shows that this bank had been selected by a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury and used by a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury because of its well-known financial standing and ability to meet all of the requirements of the Government of the United States, and the present Secretary of the Treasury, finding that its course had been honorable and just toward the Government of the United States, simply continued it as a Government depository.

But instead of following the example of his predecessor and making a few of these banks his pet banks for the purpose of benefiting them the record that has been presented to this House shows that he selected nearly three hundred of these banks all over the country, situated in forty-three different States, for the purpose of benefiting the Government of the United States and to provide against such false and malicious charges as have been made against him here to-day.

And this record shows that with reference to this money that was deposited there in payment of the custom-house, instead of having it so that it could be used by the bank for the purposes indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, it was just the contrary. It shows that that money was subject to check day by day, and that bank was compelled to transact its business in a manner so that all of this money at any moment, without any notice whatever, could be withdrawn from that bank and placed in the subtreasury in the city of New York or in any other place where it would best benefit the people of the United States. Why is it that any outcry should be made here? Is not this money in this bank as safe as it would be in the Treasury building, in the capital of our country? Does anybody deny that?

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not as safe as it would be in the subtreasury in the city of New York? Does anybody deny that? Where, Mr. Chairman, has the Government of the United States been injured by any transaction of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to any of these deposits. I say, Mr. Chairman, that he is entitled to the approbation of his countrymen for the splendid manner in which he has handled the finances of the Government. I care not what their political affiliations may be. Secretary Gage has made a record that every American ought to praise instead of denounce. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if no one desires to take the floor, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6237 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that those who have addressed the committee on this bill be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD, provided it is done within five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that gentlemen who have addressed the committee on the bill this afternoon may have five days within which to extend their remarks.

Mr. SULZER. I ask also that that leave may extend to gentlemen who may speak to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. Let each day take care for itself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TWELFTH CENSUS.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Twelfth Census to report Senate bill 2179 with sundry amendments; and I will state to the House that I desire to take this bill up and pass it, if possible, immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the bill which is now being considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Twelfth Census, reports the following bill, which the Clerk will read by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives notice that he will call the bill up for consideration immediately after the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, does he present this as a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. Yes; as a privileged report.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Chair hold that it is a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order that it is not privileged?

Mr. RUSSELL. I raise the point of order that it is not a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it is privileged.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to make the point of order. I do not know what makes this a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. There is a point of order pending. If any gentleman desires to be heard, the Chair will gladly hear him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, if he desires to discuss the point of order. I want to say that the burden of proof is upon the gentleman who presents measures here and claims they are matters of privilege, and not upon those who oppose it. I do not understand that there is any general rule, or any special rule, that makes a report from the Committee on Census privileged. If there is, it has escaped my notice up to this time. I state here now that there is no rule that makes a report from the Committee on Census privileged, I do not care in what shape it comes, or that gives it privilege over other bills.

Mr. SULZER. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask whether a number of representatives from labor organizations did not ask for a hearing on this bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. What of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. I assume from the answer of the gentleman that they did, and that they were refused.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not responsible for what the gentleman assumes. When we come to consider the bill, if the gentleman has anything to say on that subject, if it is worthy a reply, there will be a reply made to it.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the point of order, and gentlemen must confine their remarks to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to this bill being considered next in order after the urgent deficiency bill, but what I do object to is establishing a precedent that a report from the Committee on Census is a privileged one. If the gentleman wants unanimous consent to take the bill up immediately after the consideration of the present one, he has it so far as I am concerned; but I do most earnestly protest against the establishment of a precedent that makes this bill, or any report from the Committee on Census, privileged under the rule.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is not establishing a precedent; it is following what has already been established by previous Congresses.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand what authority the gentleman has for that statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. It has been held by previous Speakers that bills of this character are privileged bills.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think there will be any objection to taking it up by unanimous consent after the present bill is disposed of. Nobody on this side will object.

Mr. SULZER. I shall object unless you give the representatives of the labor organizations a hearing.

Mr. HOPKINS. Evidently the gentleman in charge of the other side does not control it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's statement in that respect is gratuitous. The gentleman from Connecticut was the first who made a statement challenging it on that side of the House, and he is not following the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. "The gentleman from Illinois" is not trying to act as leader.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be in order. The question under discussion is the point of order. Does the gentleman from Connecticut wish to be heard?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, the bill comes from the Committee on Census, of which I happen to be a member. It is a bill which proposes certain amendments to the general census law which was passed in the last Congress. The bill was considered in committee, and no suggestion was made in that committee that there was anything in it which gave it a privileged character. For myself I do not know of any single item or provision in the bill which makes it privileged.

If my colleague, the chairman of the committee, has any statement to make of its privileged character, I would like to hear it. I should have expected to have heard it in committee. I should have expected to have heard the suggestion when we were considering the bill in committee that it was to be presented as a privileged matter. On the contrary, late this afternoon the chairman of the committee did not intimate that it was to be so considered or that it was to be brought up as a privileged matter.

I am not opposed to the early consideration of the bill. A good portion of the bill is an emergency bill, and the Director of the Census is anxious for its early passage. For that reason I called the attention of the Chair to the fact that I did not think it was a privileged matter. I do not antagonize the early consideration of the bill. The chairman of the committee states that similar bills have been held to be privileged matter. It is not in my memory that that is the case.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am a little surprised that my colleague on the committee makes any reflection upon the fact that this matter was not discussed in committee, because our committee does not determine the constitutional right that this bill has as a privileged matter. I was simply directed by the committee to report the bill. The Committee on the Twelfth Census would have no authority by any vote that might be taken in that committee to make it a privileged matter or a nonprivileged matter, as the case might be, and certainly everything that has been said by my colleague on that subject is entirely foreign to the question which is now before the House.

This is a high constitutional privilege, and the legislation that is proposed in this bill is in accordance with the requirements of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. It is above all rules of this House, and when it is reported here the committee having it in charge have the clear right to call it up at any time as a matter of privilege under the Constitution of the United States and have it considered by the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague will allow me, in the last Congress was it held that our general census bill was a privileged matter?

Mr. HOPKINS. In the last Congress I did not present it as such because it happened to be reported so that I could take it up and have it passed under a suspension of the rules; but had it not been for the fact that I could get an earlier and better hearing under the rules of the House at that time, I should have done in that case as I do now, and have asked to have the bill reported as a privileged matter, and so notified the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois I want to say that it is not the Constitution with which we are dealing, but it is the rules of this House, and under our rules certain measures are made privileged, and the rules expressly provide what those matters are. In the absence of any provision that a certain matter is privileged, no matter if it is a bill that ought to be passed, no matter if it is a bill provided for in the Constitution, it is not privileged, and in our rules which expressly provides that this measure shall be privileged.

There is the rule which makes it privileged. We act under special rules. There is no provision here that a report from the Committee on Census upon measures referred to that committee shall be privileged. The rules say that reports from the Committee on Ways and Means on matters referred to that committee affecting the revenues shall be privileged, and the rules also say that reports from the Committee on Appropriations are privileged. Reports from the Committee on Printing on matters referred to it—printing for the House or the two Houses of Congress—under the rules are privileged. But there is nothing that says a report on matters referred to the Committee on Census shall be privileged, and in the absence of any such provision it seems to me, with all due respect to my able friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], I must say that I do not find any authority for his contention, and I think it would be monstrous to hold that this report would be a privileged one. In order that we may preserve the integrity of our proceedings, in order that we may not establish a bad precedent, it does seem to me that we ought not to hold that this is privileged.

It may be that it ought to be considered. Conceding that, the rules are ample under which it can be brought up. A special report from the Committee on Rules will bring it up in a moment, and it can be called up in the morning hour. That can be done immediately after the passage of this bill. There are many ways in which it can be considered. There is no difficulty about that. The course stated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL] may be taken. He is not opposing the early consideration of the bill, nor am I; but I do object most earnestly to an infraction of the rules of the House in holding a bill to be privileged when there is no law, no provision in our rules, no provision anywhere, that makes it privileged.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. I do not contend that in the rules as adopted there is any provision in any specific rule saying that this bill is a privileged bill. My contention is far beyond that. I hold that any constitutional right guaranteed to a member of this House, or any constitutional rights that are guaranteed to any measure, can not be taken away from the member or from the committee reporting a measure of that kind by the rules of the House. And this measure is something that is authorized and required by the Constitution of the United States, and as such I maintain that it is a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. How does this question arise now?

The SPEAKER. The question arises by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], chairman of the Special Committee on the Twelfth Census, bringing in his report.

Were this an original question that had not been passed upon, the Chair might rule differently than he feels constrained to rule at this time.

The Constitution of the United States makes it mandatory upon Congress to take a census of the people every ten years. It also requires the Congress to make an apportionment of the members of Congress for each State. The Constitution also authorizes the Congress to adopt rules for its procedure.

If this were an original question, the Chair would be inclined to hold that if the House adopts rules of procedure and leaves out any committee from the list of committees whose reports are privileged that that committee would be remitted to those rules of procedure adopted by the House for its guidance. But the Chair finds that a question which the Chair thinks is identical in every particular was ruled upon in the Fifty-first Congress. I quote:

A bill making an apportionment of Representatives presents a privileged question. On December 16, 1890, Mr. Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, as a privileged question, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 8900) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Eleventh Census. The bill having been read at length, Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, made the point of order that under the rule the Committee on the Eleventh Census was not included among those having the right to report at any time such business as would properly come before said committee, and that, therefore, the consideration of the bill at this time was not a privileged question.

The House will see that it could not be more fairly and squarely stated than Mr. Blount stated it:

The Speaker, Mr. Reed, being in the chair, overruled the point of order, on the ground that a bill making an apportionment is a privileged question, and it being a constitutional duty imposed on Congress, the consideration of the bill was clearly a privileged question.

At that time the Fifty-first Congress had its Committee on Rules, and probably there never was one more active than the Committee on Rules of that Congress. It was equipped with all the rules of procedure, and yet the Committee on the Eleventh Census was not clothed with the power to report at any time. Now, the Chair is unable to see any distinction in principle between an apportionment bill and a bill for taking the Twelfth Census. The Chair has examined this bill. It is amendatory of the act which we passed in the last Congress for taking the Twelfth Census. It is supplemental to that act. It contains simply provisions for taking the Twelfth Census, all in the same line, and all required by the Constitution.

If the decision made in regard to the consideration of the apportionment bill was sound law, it seems to the Chair clear that it ought to be a sound ruling that this is privileged. The Chair thinks gentlemen of the House will all agree that when decisions are made it is well, unless they are clearly in abuse of the rules of the House, that these precedents should be followed. It is a guide to all members and will aid them in their work.

Now, when the bill for the Twelfth Census was first brought up the gentleman in charge of the bill, the same gentleman as now presents this, offered it as a privileged report. The Speaker did not rule upon it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] reserved all rights against the bill, saying that he was not clear that it was a privileged bill at all, and with that reservation the bill was considered as introduced in the House, to be printed for the information of the House, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, gave notice that he would call it up the following Monday.

That being suspension day, it was passed under suspension of the rules, and the suggested questions of the week before, or some days before, were not passed on. But the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the decision made in the Fifty-first Congress is sufficient warrant for holding this to be a privileged question.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I desire to say that if this were a bill to enumerate the people, then I would agree to the Chair's proposition; if it were a bill to apportion Representatives in accordance with a census which had already been taken, I would agree with the Speaker's proposition, because both duties are plainly enjoined by the Constitution. The Constitution provides that Representatives shall be apportioned according to numbers, and the numbers are ascertained by a census taken every ten years.

The duty of taking the census is one enjoined by the Constitution; the duty of apportioning the Representatives according to that census is also enjoined upon Congress by the Constitution; but as to all other matters they are not enjoined by the Constitution, and the mere question of printing such data as may be collected is not by a constitutional injunction. Now, sir, the Constitution nowhere requires that the census shall go further than a mere enumeration of the people.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me? He evidently misapprehends some portion of this bill. This bill that I have reported provides—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Texas that the Chair has ruled on this question.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. In order that I may be in order, then, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I desire to be heard on the appeal. Now I shall be glad to hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I judge from the remark the gentleman was making that he has misapprehended the character of the bill just reported by the Committee on the Census. I will say to him that it provides, among other things, for enumeration as well as some of the provisions stated by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. If this were an enumeration of the people for the purpose of apportioning the Representatives the bill would be privileged.

The committee, however—and that was the point I desired to call the attention of the Chair to—the committee is not a privileged committee, and no committee is, as suggested by my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], except the rule makes it so; but there are matters which are privileged. For instance, I doubt if there is any provision of the rule which requires the immediate consideration of a veto message of the President, yet it has been held so, inasmuch as the Constitution says, "They shall proceed at once to consider it;" and that is a privileged matter.

The impeachment of any member of the Government, I take it, is not made privileged by the rules, though I have not specially investigated for the purpose of ascertaining; but the impeachment of any civil officer of the Government is not specially made a privileged matter by the rules; yet no gentleman on either side of the Chamber would doubt for a moment that if a member should rise and propose the impeachment of any civil officer of the Government it would be a privileged matter.

So, undoubtedly, if a bill to apportion the Representatives in the case stated by the Speaker, or a bill to enumerate the people in every decennial period, could be presented to the House, it and both of them are privileged; but the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair is that the committee is not a privileged committee, and that nothing from the committee except, first, a proposition to take a census of the people, to enumerate the people; next, to apportion the Representatives in accordance with that enumeration, could possibly be privileged, because no other two propositions are enjoined either in express terms or by fair implication by the Constitution.

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois has embarrassed his privileged proposition by incorporating into his bill other matter which is not so privileged, then he has reduced the whole proposition from privileged to unprivileged matter. I would be the last one, here or elsewhere, to insist that we needed the permission of the rules of the House to proceed with the plain constitutional duty to enumerate the people once every ten years.

I would be the last here, or elsewhere, to raise an objection against an apportionment in accordance with that enumeration, because that is a duty Congress can not refuse to perform if it keeps its oath; but, as to other matters, as to the question of printing, as to the question of details, classification of the people, their occupation, their infirmities and misfortunes, they are nowhere comprehended within the constitutional provision, and any matter relating to that really is not a matter of privilege.

If the Speaker shall insist that because it comes from the committee, because it relates to the taking of the census, therefore it must be privileged, I take it that our friends on this side of the House would feel compelled to save that point by appealing from the decision of the Chair. I desire it to be distinctly understood that the appeal does not rest upon the objection that a bill to enumerate the people or to apportion Representatives would not be privileged.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman does not care to press his motion?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take any further time, except to make one illustration. As has been well stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], whenever you couple matter that is not privileged with matter privileged, no matter how highly, you take away the privileged character. For illustration, a report from the Committee on Printing has always been held, where the printing is for the use of the House, or the two Houses, to be privileged; but if you insert in that resolution a proposition for a few hundred copies of the matter you have printed for one of the Departments, immediately the privileged character of the resolution is gone.

Now, this bill may be privileged, under the ruling of the Chair, for the enumeration of the people, but when you couple with it unprivileged matter it takes away the privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the point made by him is clearly well made; but there is not an element in this bill but that might have properly been in the original bill. What the judgment of the House may be as to the elements of this bill is another question, but it is all germane and pertinent to the enumeration of the Twelfth Census. The members of the House may differ as to the propriety of some of these provisions, but whether they do or not, they are all in line with the demands of the Constitution which require this body to take the census every ten years and to provide the manner for doing the same.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. May I suggest that the Constitution plainly indicates the purpose for which it commands the census to be taken, and that is for the purpose of the apportionment of Representatives among the several States. Now, surely the question whether they are blind, lame, or halt does not reach that question, and I do not think it is in response to the constitutional injunction of making an enumeration once every ten years.

The SPEAKER. The language of the Constitution is this:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Now, taking the census is the basis of apportionment, and the apportionment follows. Both are absolutely and explicitly commanded by the Constitution. If the decision about the apportionment was a correct decision, there can be no escape from the Chair's holding that the provision of law for taking the census is also within the constitutional provision.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I would suggest to the Chair that the Chair omitted to read the first part, which provides for the apportionment of Representatives and direct taxes. Now, as a means of ascertaining the basis of that apportionment, it directs the census to be taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not read that because that has been repealed.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Only by the fourteenth amendment, and the fourteenth amendment simply leaves out the direct taxes. But in view of the decision of the Supreme Court on the income-tax case, it is hardly safe to assert that this part of the section has been repealed, for they held that law invalid because it did not apportion the tax according to the method prescribed in that provision. And surely the Supreme Court overlooked a very important thing if that has been repealed.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman from Texas permit a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. I wish to ask my friend from Texas this question: If the original bill providing for the taking of the census was a privileged bill, would not any bill to amend that have the same privilege?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. If it only related to the enumeration of the people, it would; but the trouble here is that they have complicated that constitutional requirement with matter not required by the Constitution. For instance, I have no question that Congress, in the exercise of its power, can direct that they ascertain the number of red-headed people in the country, but they are not required to do that by the Constitution.

Now, the number of people in the country is the basis of representation, and they are required to ascertain the number of people for the purpose of apportioning representation. But as to the physical infirmities, the complexion of the inhabitants—I see my friends smiling at the expense of my distinguished friend from Illinois, and I wish to say that my remark was to be entirely impersonal—beyond that it is purely a matter of the discretion of Congress, and not the performance of a duty enjoined by the Constitution. The only thing that is privileged in a bill relating to the census is that it is a bill to execute a constitutional command to enumerate the people. A bill that does that is plainly privileged.

Mr. MORRIS. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. One word. Now, by adding something that is not commanded by the Constitution, it reduces the proposition from a privileged one to a nonprivileged one, because the nonprivileged matter taints the whole proposition.

Mr. MORRIS. The Constitution provides, if I have read it correctly, that that census shall be taken in such manner as may be provided by law, does it not?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. The enumeration of the people, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. That the census shall be taken, that is what it says; that the census shall be taken as shall be provided by law, as I understand it.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. No; not that. The word "census" is not used in the Constitution. The Constitution says:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

If you want to enumerate the people, to ascertain the number of them, I grant you that Congress can determine the manner of doing that.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that it seems to me that that question might arise when the law under consideration for taking the enumeration was being considered. He might object to anything being put into that bill except a mere enumeration; but when that bill providing for an enumeration is allowed to pass with other provisions in it, if that bill has the privilege of the Constitution, would not an amendment to that bill have the privilege of the Constitution?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON. As it is now half past 5, I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] if he will not yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That will leave the matter pending.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Of course the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It need not be decided now.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment to allow the Chair to lay before the House a message from the President of the United States?

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, with reference to the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasian and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Cadiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain.

I recommend that, as an act of equity and comity, provision be made by the Congress for reimbursement to the company of the actual expenses incurred by it in the repair of the cables.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 16, 1900.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CHANGE OF COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Washington, January 10, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to request that I be relieved from further service as a member of the Committee on Claims of the House.

I wish to retire from this committee for the reasons set forth in the conversation I had with you a few days ago.

Very respectfully, yours,

L. FLETCHER.

HON. DAVID B. HENDERSON,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on excusing the gentleman from Minnesota from acting on the Committee on Claims. If there is no objection, it will be held that he is excused. The Chair hears no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment to the Committee on Claims of Mr. WEEKS of Michigan.

And then, on motion of Mr. CANNON (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation to replace the light-house at Sapelo, Ga.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HOAR, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

REPORT ON REINDEER IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska in 1899," together with its accompanying maps and illustrations.

This information is communicated in response to a resolution offered by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. I suppose it ought to go there, although it is often printed without such a reference.

The motion was agreed to.

LAWS RELATING TO COURTS-MARTIAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a bill to prevent the failure of military justice, and for other purposes, prepared by the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, and stating that it meets with his approval; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOILIATION CLAIM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 2, 1885, in the French spoliation claims, set out in the annexed findings of the court, relative to the brig Lady Wallerstorff, John Gutterson, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TURNER. I present a petition of the legislature of Washington, relative to the Northern Pacific Railway lands, declaring some to be forfeited, etc. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House memorial No. 4. State of Washington. Sixth regular session. To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Washington, respectfully represent that a large number of citizens of Clark and Cowlitz counties, in the State of Washington, are actual settlers and home builders upon certain odd-numbered sections of public land within the forfeited limits of the grant to the "Northern Pacific Railroad Company," opposite to and coterminous with the line of said road not constructed between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oreg.

That said settlers established their homes on said lands after the time expired within which, under the grant, said road was to have been completed and after it had become apparent said line would not be built down the Columbia River between said points by said company, and fully expecting to derive title to said lands from the Government of the United States under the homestead laws.

That said settlers number about 600 and are mostly heads of families, and, although poor and without capital, they have, by hard labor and self-denial, made extensive and valuable improvements on said lands, consisting largely in clearing off timber, stumps, logs, and brush, at great labor and expense of time, amounting in many instances to $100 per acre, and in building dwellings and other structures thereon as homes for themselves and families.

That the grant to said company from "Wallula to Portland" was made July 2, 1864. That an additional and new grant was made to said company May 31, 1870, on its line from Portland to Tacoma, which line was definitely located September 22, 1882, but was not constructed until the year 1884.

That the technical limits of these two grants overlapped northeast of Portland into both Clark and Cowlitz counties. That a general withdrawal of lands was made under said grants by the Interior Department on August 13, 1870, and maintained regardless of the Congressional act of forfeiture of September 29, 1890, until the 18th day of July, 1895, when in a decision known as the Spaulding case, 31 Land Decisions, page 57, the Secretary of the Interior held, in conformity with a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States (152 U. S., 234), that no lands included in the prior grant of July 2, 1864, were or could be granted in the subsequent grant of May 31, 1870, and that all said lands, pursuant to said forfeiture act, were therefore public lands and subject to entry under the laws of the United States.

That homestead entries were thereafter allowed on said lands in all cases, except where the railroad company had obtained patents thereon.

That patents were procured by said company for a large part of said lands in May, 1895, notwithstanding the then pending homestead applications of said settlers and the fact that the Spaulding decision above referred to was then being formulated.

That subsequently the Secretary of the Interior determined that these patents were wrongfully issued and requested the Attorney-General to bring suits for their cancellation.

That said settlers were threatened by the railroad company with eviction from their homes on said lands, and, before the Spaulding decision, many of them were driven against their protest into making contracts with the company for the purchase of their homes, in which they had invested years of toil, but to defend which they had no money or other resources to carry on litigation with a powerful corporation.

That common justice and humanity calls for legislative relief.

That attempts of this kind have been made, but so far they have been ineffectual.

That the act of Congress of March 3, 1866, extending the time for bringing suits to cancel patents has resulted in nothing for the benefit of said settlers, but has, on the contrary, apparently confirmed the company's title and to an extent aided the company in enforcing said contracts.

That the act of Congress of July 1, 1898, gives the company the right to select other lands in lieu of all lands it desires to relinquish in these limits, but does not require it to relinquish any lands it has sold or contracted to sell. That said last-mentioned act does not appear applicable to the lands of said settlers situated in forfeited limits, and, if it did, would be fatally injurious to hundreds of their number who have been compelled to contract with the railroad company under the erroneous rulings of the Land Department prior to the Spaulding decision and by the threats of the company to eject them from their homes. That the practical effect of said act is to confuse and embarrass the rights of said settlers and ought to be amended.

Your memorialists therefore ask, in behalf of said settlers, that said act of Congress of July 1, 1898, be amended by eliminating from the second proviso thereof the provision that the company shall not be bound to relinquish lands sold or contracted by it, and that an act be passed declaring that the forfeiture act of September 29, 1890, applies to and includes the lands within the limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company opposite to and coterminous with the line of said road not constructed between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., within which limits, extending to or near the Willamette meridian, are situated the lands of said settlers, and directing the immediate institution of suits by the Attorney General of the United States for the cancellation of the patents to said lands wrongfully issued as aforesaid to said railroad company. And we request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to do all in their power to that end, and hereby direct that copies of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

Passed the house January 17, 1899.

Passed the senate February 9, 1899.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

Olympia, Wash., December 2, 1899.

I, Will D. Jenkins, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the enrolled document now on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Washington the day and year above written.

[SEAL.]

WILL D. JENKINS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. TURNER. I present a memorial of the legislature of Washington, remonstrating against the cession of territory in Alaska. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate memorial No. 5. State of Washington. Sixth regular session.

To the President of the United States:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Washington, would respectfully represent that in 1825 the Governments of Russia and Great Britain, by clear and formal treaty, determined the intervening line between their respective possessions on the continent of North America. Great Britain then acknowledged the right of Russia to all of the Pacific coast north of 54° 40' and Portland Canal and west of the summits of the range of mountains nearest to the coast. If such mountains were far from the shore, then the line was to be drawn 10 marine leagues from the ocean. During the following forty-two years Russia remained in undisputed ownership of all that region known then as Russian America, and until in 1867 her title thereto was passed to the United States for $7,000,000.

At that time the white inhabitants numbered about 1,000, all of whom, save a few engaged in the fur trade, were reliant upon the Russian Government for their means of living. There were no fisheries, no manufactures, no mining, no farming, no business or relations with any other country and people than Russia and the Russians.

With the advent of the Americans came a change. Steamers began to run there from California, Oregon, and Washington ports; people of the world were invited to take advantage of the opportunities on every hand; military and naval protection was given against the savages of the land; mail services were established and Government explorations undertaken; the fur-seal fishery employed scores of vessels and hundreds of men and became worth millions of dollars; salmon were found off the coast, and great fisheries were established, employing hundreds of men, who put up now 25,000,000 to 40,000,000 1-pound cans of fish each summer for the Australian, European, and American markets; quartz was found; mines were opened and mills built, one of them, with 880 stamps, being the largest in the world; placers were also found, and from the two sources upward of $5,000,000 of gold were obtained during the year 1898.

Two hundred and fifty American steamers were engaged in the Alaska trade last year, and an average of more than one vessel a day departed from Seattle alone for ports in that Territory. Sawmills have been started there, some farming done, a halibut fishery begun, and in the summer a great number of tourists go to those interesting shores.

All this development of resources has involved the opening of the country, the civilizing of the natives, and the establishment there of a large population of American citizens, with two cities of at least 3,000 inhabitants each, and many smaller towns. In these cities are daily newspapers, electric lights, telephones, street cars, and a railroad to the interior. In the whole Territory are over 30,000 citizens of our country, an average gain since 1867 of 1,000 per annum.

With its practically untouched timber, its coal, petroleum, codfish, whale, fur-bearing animals, etc., added to its seal, salmon, gold, and other resources as attractions, there is reason to believe that Alaska, with its half million square miles of territory, will support comfortably a half million people a half century hence. It is no Greenland, but rather a Sweden and Norway, and like those countries will be a great factor in the commerce of the world.

While Russia held the country Great Britain apparently cared nothing for it. Beyond a fur-trading privilege no attempt was made to avail of it. Taken during the Crimean war, it was cheerfully relinquished at the close as of no value.

Not until the citizens of the United States showed its worth in fish, in timber, in gold, and in trade did the Britons and Canadians evince interest in and desire for it. Then by insidious methods attempts began to fix a claim upon the country. The old maps were discarded, and new maps issued, upon which the boundary line began further north and was located nearer the sea, taking into the Dominion a considerable area of the best portion of southeastern Alaska.

The next step was to get the newspapers to publish the claim and to fix it in the public mind as a proper and regular thing contemplated even by the treaty makers of 1825. From this it was easy to cause a contention, first local, and then international, in consequence of which their claim could be placed before the British-American joint high commission, where nothing could be lost, but where something might be gained in the making of concessions and exchanges common to such bodies. It was a clever scheme, but one without honesty, justice, or merit.

In accordance with this plan, it is now proposed to cede to the Canadians a portion of Alaska. It is said that the ceded portion will include the head of Lynn Canal, made world-famous during the past two years by the rush of 50,000 gold miners to the Klondike. It will wholly include the town of Dyea, with its inhabitants, its aerial tramway, and its United States military garrison; and it will also include one-half the city of Skagway, with 4,000 more inhabitants, its 20 miles of American-built railway, its four large wharves, its trade, and growing importance.

Again, it is reported that the ceded portion is to be other than that above described, and is to include the head of Pyramid Harbor, from which [it] takes inland the route to the Yukon, known as the Dalton trail, established by and heretofore solely used by Americans.

The cession of either of these places or of any other Alaskan port will transfer from the United States to a foreign power the sole and absolute control of intercourse with the great interior, in which is involved a traffic of enormous proportions and of great wealth. Such cession will injure every citizen of the United States from San Diego to Sitka, and will humiliate the country from ocean to ocean and end to end. For the first time in our history our flag will be hauled down and the land over which it has long floated will be given away, sold, or surrendered; this, too, without considering the wishes, wants, or rights of the people most affected, and this, too, for either no consideration or for a consideration of trifling character. That such an act can be perpetrated in these days of national glory, of patriotism, and expansion is incredible. Against its commission the protests of the people should prevail, and that of the State of Washington is here and now earnestly and respectfully presented.

Your memorialists respectfully ask that after consideration of this, their memorial, by the President, is to be transmitted to the joint high commission for the adjustment of Canadian questions.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

A bill (S. 1934) for the relief of the Globe Works, of Boston, Mass.;

A bill (S. 189) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo;

A bill (S. 32) for the relief of George W. Weston; and

A bill (S. 1744) for the relief of the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 795) for the relief of The William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 103) for the relief of John O'Keane, of the State of Washington, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2258) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. QUARLES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1771) granting a pension to Ellie Kee, reported it with amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

EGBERT C. SAMMIS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8) for the relief of Egbert C. Sammis, administrator of the estate of John S. Sammis, deceased, late of Duval County, Fla., reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 8) entitled "A bill for the relief of Egbert C. Sammis, administrator of the estate of John S. Sammis," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] December 14, 1899, to report it with amendments; and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 3, to strike out "fifteen thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred;" in line 7 to strike out "five thousand" and insert

"twenty-five hundred," and in line 8 to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "five thousand," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 104, third session Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the Daughters of the American Revolution, 1800-1897, of which 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendments were agreed to.
The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

DAUGHTERS OF ARTHUR BARNES, DECEASED.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER on the 10th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to May Barnes, Blanche Barnes, and Maud Bynum, daughters of Arthur Barnes, deceased, late a messenger on the rolls of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate paid by law to said messenger, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 9th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Philippines be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,800 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2488) granting a pension to John Eckland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2489) to provide for the further distribution of the reports of the Supreme Court; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2490) granting a pension to Margaret A. Miner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 2491) for the relief of George H. Morton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 2492) granting an increase of pension to C. Cunningham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2493) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for land in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I introduce two very extended bills having relation to the Post-Office Department. One of them has reference to the civil administration of the Department and the other is a codification of the criminal laws pertaining to offenses against the postal service, with, I think, some amendments. The bills are introduced (and I make this brief explanation because the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is here) in two separate measures with the idea of referring so much of the subject as affects the criminal statutes to the Committee on the Judiciary, and to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads so much as affects the civil administration of the Department, with the hope that after the Judiciary Committee has, as it will, carefully considered the measure, then it may be reported to the Senate and the two bills be consolidated into one measure.

There has been no attempt ever to codify the laws of the Post-Office Department, and for nearly thirty years the different laws affecting its administration and offenses against it have been scattered through hundreds of pages of our statute books. The Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department has, with the commission assisting him, at great pains prepared a summary and codification of all the laws with the idea that perhaps at this session of Congress we may be able to whip them into shape and get them in the form of one chapter of our statutes. This is especially important from the fact that there is from all over the country a demand for the codification of the postal rules and regulations, which are found necessarily very difficult of acquirement by postmasters and others.

Therefore, in introducing these bills, one of which is for reference to the Post-Office Committee and the other to the Judiciary Committee, I venture to call the attention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to them.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Colorado is doubtless aware, as the Senate is doubtless well aware, that two years ago there was passed a bill, and it became a law, for the codification of all the criminal and penal statutes of the United States. The commission was appointed by President McKinley, and their work, I suppose, is nearly completed. At any rate, the additional duty was imposed upon them of codifying the statutes in regard to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and that portion of the work is complete and it has been reported to the Senate. I think the measure about to be introduced by the Senator from Colorado will be a great aid to the Senate. I think it will be necessary, however, to compare it with the work of the commission.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. And then I think the idea suggested by the Senator, instead of having the whole work of the commission taken up at once, to have this substituted for that portion, is a very convenient way of proceeding.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am obliged to the Senator. I know they will dovetail together.

The bill (S. 2494) to revise and codify the laws relating to the Post-Office Department and the postal service, and to amend the same, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (S. 2495) to revise and codify the laws relating to offenses against the postal service, and to amend the same, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 2496) granting certain lands to the town of Manitou, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2497) granting an increase of pension to Sarah W. Rowell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2498) for the relief of John F. Foard; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. To accompany the bill I present a petition signed by a number of citizens of North Carolina, requesting that the bill for the relief of Dr. John F. Foard be passed, and a number of papers establishing this claim. I move that the petition and papers be referred with the bill to the Committee on Claims. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2499) to authorize needed repairs of the graveled or macadamized road from the city of Newbern, N. C., to the national cemetery near said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 2500) for the repeal of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2501) granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 2502) for the establishment of a general depot of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, at Omaha, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 2503) for the relief of Deford & Co., of Baltimore, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 2504) for the relief of Holy Cross College; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2505) granting an increase of pension to James C. Carlton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2506) granting an increase of pension to Michael Dillon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. TURNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1676) for the payment of certain claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TURLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1676) for the payment of certain claims; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

MITCHELL F. JAMAR.

On motion of Mr. CAFFERY it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1668) for the relief of Mitchell F. Jamar, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDAATION CLAIMS.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate all judgments for Indian depredations that have been rendered by the Court of Claims that are not included in his last report.

IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGATION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to have a survey made and to submit a report of the survey and an estimate for the improvement of navigation of the Livingston Creek, in Columbus County, N. C., and Lockwood Folly River, in Brunswick County, N. C.

THE RAMIE INDUSTRY.

Mr. ELKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That Senate Document No. 47, and Senate Document No. 57, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, be reprinted for the use of the Senate, together with certain additional matter pertaining to the ramie industry, to be revised by Mr. Slaughter, with information for the farmers' uses.

Then, that the Public Printer be authorized to present Mr. S. H. Slaughter with the stereotype and plates of his ramie documents, Nos. 47 and 57, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, and the articles published on the ramie industry by the Government in the May and September, 1897, numbers of the American Republics Bulletin, to be used in his work for the promotion of the ramie industry, free of charge to him.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By agreement certain resolutions were permitted to lie on the table, and those resolutions are now in order.

Mr. BERRY. There is a bill which I am informed is especially important—

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow this resolution, which is in order, to pass? I believe it will be passed now without debate and without being read.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 8th instant. It has been read in full.

Mr. VEST. I should like to hear the amendment read.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment has been agreed to by myself and my colleague, and it has been read. Does the Senator desire to have it read once more?

Mr. VEST. I was not in the Senate when that amendment was read, and I simply want to understand what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment which was accepted as a part of the resolution by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. After line 7 in the original resolution the following amendment was inserted:

Also, all instructions given by him to the commissioners to the Philippine Islands, or either of them;

Also, any information which may have come to him or any Department of the Government since January 1, 1898, in regard to any plans of the people in arms against the United States for the pillage of Manila, for risings in the city, or for the destruction of foreign property and the massacre of foreign residents;

Also, any information that may have come to him or any Department of the Government of the treatment of the other inhabitants of the Philippines by those in arms against the authority of the United States, and of the attitude and feeling of such other inhabitants or tribes toward the so-called government of Aguinaldo and his armed followers;

Also, any information that may have come to him or any Department of the Government of the treatment of prisoners, either Spanish or American, by the people in arms against the authority of the United States;

Also, any information that may have come to him or any Department of the Government as to any aid or encouragement received by Aguinaldo and his followers from persons in the United States, as to what pamphlets, speeches, or other documents emanating from the United States, and adverse to its authority and to its policy, were circulated, in whole or in part, among the Filipinos in arms against the United States, among the other inhabitants of the islands, or among the soldiers of the United States, and any information as to the effect, if any, of such pamphlets, speeches, and other documents, or of similar utterances in the United States, upon the course of the rebellion against the United States;

Also, any further or other information which would tend to throw light upon the conduct and events of the insurrection against the authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands, and of the military movements for its suppression since January 1, 1898.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish briefly to address the Senate on this subject.

The resolution is in the discretion of the President. Such information as he chooses to send us we are to receive under this resolution. I am in favor of passing the resolution. I am desirous of securing whatever information we can upon this subject.

Early in the session, nearly a month ago, I introduced a resolution asking whether the vessels of our Navy, the officers of our Navy, had saluted the flag of the Philippine republic; whether two of our vessels accompanied a Filipino vessel to Subig Bay for the purpose of capturing a Spanish garrison, and whether after the surrender of that garrison we turned the prisoners over to Aguinaldo's forces. That resolution was tabled by the Senate without allowing me the privilege of speaking upon it. The facts contained in that resolution, in my opinion, were true. We made Aguinaldo and his forces our ally by saluting their flag and by accompanying them in the capture of a Spanish garrison, the prisoners of which we turned over to them.

I introduced the resolution in good faith. I was not sure then, but I feel sure now, that the facts contained in the resolution were true, and I wanted the record evidence. Information has come to my knowledge since—the statement of an officer who accompanied this expedition to Subig Bay—corroborating the facts contained in the resolution, and thus is disclosed the reason why the information was denied. The resolution was in the proper form; it was a proper question.

The storm of indignation on the part of the American people and many of the Republican newspapers throughout the country at the suppression of this resolution led to a change of tactics, and then I introduced the second resolution, asking if the insurgents, after fighting had commenced, did not send General Torres with a flag of truce and ask that fighting be stopped, and that a neutral zone should be agreed upon, the boundaries of which were to be established by General Otis and satisfactory to him, until negotiations could be had to see whether the difficulties could be settled, and I also asked in that resolution what reply was made and whether General Otis did not reply that fighting having once commenced, it must go on to the grim end.

That resolution was not laid upon the table at the time, but an amendment or a substitute was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asking for all the information and all the dispatches which may have passed between our officers and the insurgents, as they are called. But on yesterday my second resolution calling for these facts was laid upon the table. I conceived these facts to be pertinent. If we had recognized Aguinaldo's forces and Aguinaldo's government by saluting their flag, and had acted with them and made them our allies, then we are now fighting our allies.

If we began the war, as General Otis indicates in his report, by killing the first man and then acting on the aggressive while the enemy acted upon the defensive, it seems to me the proof is conclusive that the war was commenced by us, and if, after two days' fighting, the insurgents wanted to stop the war, to stop the killing, and we said it must go on to the grim end, then I assert, Mr. President, that the blood of every soldier who has fallen since that time is on the head of this Administration and there is no escape from it; the puerile and silly talk about those who oppose the policy of the Administration being guilty of the death of our brave men disappears absolutely, and the responsibility goes where it belongs: the sixty boys from South Dakota who lost their lives, conscripted into an unwilling service, retained after their term had expired, lies at the doors of the Administration, and there is no chance to avoid it.

This information has been withheld. My resolution to acquire it has been laid upon the table. I hope the resolution which we are now to pass will bring the information. It is pertinent to the issue.

But, Mr. President, I offered another resolution yesterday—a resolution calling for all the instructions to our commissioners at Paris and the correspondence between the Administration and the commissioners at Paris; but that was laid upon the table, and then the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] charged me with trying to put the Administration in a hole.

Mr. President, it seems to me, in the light of the facts which have been developed in this contest to secure information, that the only thing that can put the Administration in a hole is the truth and that it is the purpose to keep the truth from the American people in order to keep from putting the Administration in a hole. If getting the truth before the people of the United States will embarrass the Administration, I can not help it, and I shall try to get it. I charge that this censorship of the press, this concealment of facts, was for the purpose of protecting the interests of the Administration for reelection, and now I am charged, because I tried to get the facts by a proper resolution, with trying to put the Administration in a hole.

Now, let us see. It is asserted by the imperialists that this situation was brought upon us by an act of God; that these islands are in our hands by the act of Providence. The President alludes to this fact in his message, and in speeches he has stated that God has placed a duty upon us, or similar language. Many of those who advocate this policy, not of expansion but of imperialism—the government of colonies against their will and by conquest—declare that we are doing God's service.

Now, Mr. President, if this information which is asked for by this last resolution discloses the fact that the President of the United States immediately upon the signing of the protocol which led finally to the treaty of peace instructed our commissioners to take nothing less than the island of Luzon, and if afterwards he instructed them to take the whole group, the only way I can see that God's hand is in this work is that He must have made Mr. McKinley His prophet. He must have appeared in a vision to the President. Of course, if this is true, the disclosure of these instructions and this information would put the Administration in a hole.

What are the facts which led up to the treaty with Spain? I find in the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1898, on page 122, volume 2, the following telegram:

DEWEY (care American consul), Hongkong: WASHINGTON, August 13, 1898.

The President desires to receive from you any important information you may have of the Philippines; the desirability of these islands; the character of their population; coal and other mineral deposits; their harbor and commercial advantages, and in a naval and commercial sense which would be the most advantageous. If you have other information which may be of value to the Government in their negotiations, the President may desire your presence here. If he should request you to come, take the quickest route of travel.

ALLEN.

Here, then, is a telegram the day Manila fell and the day after the protocol was signed, sent by Mr. Allen, the First Assistant Secretary of the Navy, to Mr. Dewey to know which island or whether all the islands were worth grabbing or not. Dewey answered as follows:

MANILA, August 20, 1898.

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, Washington:

Referring to the Department's telegram of August 13, important islands are: Colon, Luzon, Panay, Cebu, Negros, Leyte. Others, owing to the nature of the inhabitants, have a small amount of civilization, want of cultivation. They may be neglected, especially isles of southern group.

The isles of the southern group are where the Sultan of Sulu reigned, where they have polygamy and slavery. Dewey said, "They may be neglected, especially the isles of the southern group."

Luzon is in all respects the most desirable to retain. Contains most important commercial ports. Manila is farthest north. Produces all of the good tobacco. Friendly natives. Civilization somewhat advanced. Not yet developed. Possible rich minerals. Population, 825,000. Subic Bay best harbor for coaling purposes and military. Water deep; landlocked; easily defended. Strategically, command of bay and city of Manila, with arsenal at Cavite, most valuable.

Panay, Cebu, Negros thickly populated, most civilized, and well cultivated. Iloilo second commercial port; center of sugar trade; a good harbor strategically; in view of the situation, good for defense. Cebu third commercial port; a good harbor, very desirable. No coal of good quality can be procured in Philippine Islands. Some has been mined on Cebu, English company. I trust it may not be necessary to order me to Washington. Should regret very much to leave here while matters remain in present critical condition.

DEWEY.

Now, Mr. President, it appears that immediately upon signing the protocol the President attempted to ascertain the value of these islands, whether they had coal and mineral, etc.—their resources. Was it an inspiration that led the President to make this inquiry? Certainly if God had anything to do with this transaction the inspiration must have come to the person who had the power and did direct that we should take nothing less than the island of Luzon.

Afterwards we took all the group, polygamy and everything else. Who directed that? Was that God's work also? Who insisted that our flag should fly above a harem and a slave market? Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that if a man did a philanthropic act, if he did something prompted by the better nature of man, it would be well to charge it to the Supreme Being. But if a man is going to plunder somebody else and wants to know whether what he has is worth stealing or not, the inspiration ought to come from the devil and not from God.

But, Mr. President, this extreme philanthropic view of the subject, this extreme responsibility thrown upon the Deity, is not shared in by all men. They are divided on the subject. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is extremely intense in this direction, and also in the direction of taking the islands, because they are rich and will be so profitable to have, while the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] objects to the sordid view of the Senator from Indiana and does not want quite so much philanthropy mixed up with the transaction.

Now, what I want to ascertain is what the argument is on the part of the imperialists. Are we going to rely on the doctrine that we are going to bless those people with our civilization against their will, and that God has ordered us to do a great work? That is the English doctrine, the doctrine which has justified the plunder of every colony she has conquered on earth. Are we going to do that, or are we going, after all, to fall back on half of the position of the Senator from Indiana and the whole position of the Washington Post on this subject, and are we simply going to say, "They are rich and worth seizing, and therefore we will seize them, no matter how much blood and treasure it costs"? If the contest is to settle down to this proposition, then perhaps the information asked by my amendment which was tabled yesterday, for the instructions to the commissioners, is immaterial.

If we are going to settle down to the proposition that here is a foothold from which we can join the other robber nations of the world in plundering China, and the foothold itself is worth having, then I am prepared to show, Mr. President, that the islands are not worth having; that they will confer no happiness upon the people of the United States; that they will simply increase the burden of the men who produce the wealth of this country, for we raise our taxes by a per capita levy upon consumption. It will simply lay a burden upon the people who raise the revenue and pay the taxes, and compel them not only to furnish the money, but to furnish the common soldiers, to be officered by the wealthy classes, who own and control the Administration. Our boys will look forward to a career to end in unknown graves in a tropical land. A high aspiration, is it not, for the descendants of men who established, as they believed, a perpetual and eternal republic in this country?

No revenue can come from these islands to the United States. We have spent more money already than every dollar of the commerce, if their commerce is no greater than it has been in the past, that those islands will have for the next fifteen or twenty years. Their total commerce, their imports and their exports, were not to exceed $15,000,000 a year. We have spent $200,000,000 already, besides the $20,000,000 we gave Spain.

Did Spain insist on our taking the Sulu Islands, with its slavery and polygamy, when we offered her $20,000,000 for these islands? The correspondence would show. We are in the dark on that subject.

If she did, with what irony, with what concealed satisfaction, she must look upon the act! I imagine the Spanish people enjoying great satisfaction at the wonderful victory which they have gained over us by the overthrow of every principle we ever advocated and the adoption of the Spanish policy. Did Spain force upon us this Sulu group? I should like to have known that fact. But if, after all, this debate is simply to be that this is a profitable venture and the elements of philanthropy are to be discarded and abandoned, if cant and hypocrisy are no longer to be the chief reason given, before this debate is over we shall show that a constant loss and drain must come to the people of the United States if we undertake to hold the group.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate—

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make one statement, which I did not wish to make before, I was so anxious to have the resolution adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was adopted?

Mr. HOAR. I will move to reconsider the vote in form, and I make it now. I merely wish to say that there are one or two phrases in the amendment of my colleague which do not commend themselves to my judgment as fitting phrases, but I did not wish to make any point on them or to delay the resolution by discussing them. I do not want them quoted against me hereafter as expressing my belief of the present condition of things; that is all. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

SEIZURES IN AND NEAR DELAGOA BAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Maine, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HALE on the 10th instant, as follows:

Whereas property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa, without good reason for the same and contrary to the accepted principles of international law; and

Whereas said property is now unjustly detained by the military authorities of Great Britain, in disregard of the rights of the owners of the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to send to the Senate all information in possession of the State Department relating to said seizure and detention; and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid, and whether or not the Department has informed the proper British authorities that, if said detention is persisted in, such act will be considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not suppose that there is any objection to the resolution; but, at the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I wish to amend the second whereas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to modify the resolution.

Mr. HALE. The second whereas reads:

Whereas said property is now unjustly detained, etc.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have not the resolution before me, but I suggest to the Senator from Maine that as I recollect it it alleges as a matter of fact and law, of course, that the property was improperly and unjustly seized. That is just the question at issue. I do not think we ought to be concluded on that point. I suggest the same amendment with regard to the first whereas.

Mr. HALE. Let the second be amended first so as to read:

Whereas it is alleged said property is now unjustly detained, etc.

The SECRETARY. After the word "whereas" insert the words "it is alleged."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have the resolution read.

Mr. HALE. As soon as we get it modified it will be read, of course. The first whereas reads:

Whereas property of the citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain—

There is no question about that—in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa.

I think that is all right.

Mr. DAVIS. How does it read now?

Mr. HALE. Now let the resolution as amended be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Whereas property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa, without good reason for the same, and contrary to the accepted principles of international law; and

Whereas it is alleged said property is now unjustly detained by the military authorities of Great Britain, in disregard of the rights of the owners of the same: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to send to the Senate all information in possession of the State Department relating to said seizure and detention, and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid, and whether or not the Department has informed the proper British authorities that if said detention is persisted in such act will be considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I wish to be heard for a few moments on the motives which impel me to make that motion.

It is my present impression that this resolution or any resolutions on this subject are prematurely introduced. The event to which this resolution relates is not a month old; it is in course of diplomatic consideration. Nothing has appeared yet to indicate that the negotiations are not proceeding in the most satisfactory manner. But, Mr. President, irrespective of that, I think it is gravely to be considered whether the absolute assertion in the first "whereas" of this resolution is correct or may not be incorrect as a principle of law under all the circumstances as now understood. It is asserted in the first line of the first "whereas" of this resolution that—

Whereas property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized—

That is well understood to relate to American flour seized upon British vessels; and here the declaration is that this flour under any circumstances, or under the circumstances involved in that case, not fully understood as yet, not yet reported upon, is absolutely not contraband of war.

Mr. President, in regard to that, the principle, as I understand it, is that flour or any product of that character may or may not be contraband under the particular circumstances of the case. As a general rule, the products, like flour, of a neutral country are not contraband; but it is a question of fact whether the immediate destination of such flour is for hostile purposes, namely, the sustenance of a belligerent army. That is a question of fact. If it is so immediately destined it is contraband of war.

The first recital proceeds still further:

without good reason for the same, and contrary to the accepted principles of international law.

That is a declaration by the Senate deciding the very question in dispute, the question concerning which the two Governments are now negotiating—whether in this particular case, this special situation, that seizure has been a departure from or contrary to the principles of international law. My impression, as at present advised, is that it will not be wise for the Senate to make an explicit statement of that kind when such a matter is under negotiation, and when, after all, the determination of a clear question of fact must be made before the question of law can possibly arise.

This event is not a month old; it is being negotiated about. No information has been given that the negotiations are not progressing satisfactorily. Let us wait and see before we pass resolutions of this character, authoritatively determining as an absolute principle of law that which we do not know and can not know is applicable to the yet unascertained facts of this particular case.

But, Mr. President, what strikes me as the thing most to be criticised in this resolution—and I do not want to vote upon it under present conditions without more consideration being given to it—is the concluding paragraph, which reads:

And whether or not the Department has informed the proper British authorities that if said detention is persisted in such act will be considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States.

I venture to say that no declaration of that kind was ever given out by a government, either through its executive organs or its legislative bodies, until negotiations had failed and as an immediate preliminary warning that the situation had become so irremediable by negotiation as to probably require the invocation of hostile acts.

To require the Secretary of State or the President, in regard to any negotiation which is all around understood to be progressing satisfactorily so far and not yet concluded, to inform another Government in limine that unless the very thing which the two Governments are contesting about diplomatically is yielded at once refusal shall be "considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States" is very serious and offensive language. It means, in substance, in effect, and by all usage, it is nothing but a threat of resort to the last reason of kings.

I think, Mr. President, the resolution would best be referred. The Senate ought not, at the present amicable stage of the controversy, to decide as an absolute principle of law the very question that is under negotiation; it ought not, above all things, to make the declaration with which this resolution concludes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the circumstances that gave rise to this resolution are found in the statement which I ask may be read from the Secretary's desk touching the seizure of American property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. DAVIS. May I ask the Senator what it is he desires to have read?

Mr. HALE. It is an extract from a report in one of the daily New York papers at the time of the transaction.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the date?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember. It was at the time of the seizure, perhaps the next day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The date of the dispatch is December 26, the Chair is informed. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

TWENTY THOUSAND BARRELS OF FLOUR ABOARD.

Three steamships sailing from New York for South African ports, including Lourenço Marquez, in Delagoa Bay, in Portuguese territory, have been held up by the British within three months. The Dutch steamship Maria, which sailed from this port on August 30, arrived at Cape Town on October 4, at East London on November 6, and at Delagoa Bay on November 12; the British steamer Beatrice sailed from New York on October 17 for Algoa Bay, East London, and Delagoa Bay, and the British steamer Mushona left New York on November 3 for Algoa Bay and Port Natal.

Each of these vessels carried American flour consigned to Portuguese merchants at Lourenço Marquez. The total amount was about 20,000 barrels. Norton & Son, of the Produce Exchange Annex, are the agents for all three of these ships.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I drew the resolution with some care, intending to limit it in its effects to an inquiry. The Senate is entitled to know what the situation is; the country is entitled to know what the situation is. It does not know, and there is to-day profound ignorance as to what is going on in asserting the rights of the United States which have been infringed by the military authorities of Great Britain.

The statements of fact in the resolution are borne out by the situation that this property of citizens of the United States—not arms, not explosives, not munitions of war, but flour—proceeding to a foreign port, belonging to American citizens, has been seized and that this property is not contraband of war. No lawyer can doubt it. We do not need the investigation of a committee to determine that.

It is no light event. Property of our citizens transported in the line of peaceful trade, seized by one of the armed powers in a war that is going on, is a thing which profoundly affects the American people; it affects every corn grower, every wheat farmer, the owner of the cattle on a thousand hills, the mill man, the middleman—everybody who is interested in producing and exporting the products of the farm and the field is interested in this question and is entitled to know what has been done in this case.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, says that we shall not know and that the Department shall not be asked until his committee has taken the resolution and passed upon it, as it would upon a statute or upon a treaty; and many Senators believe if it goes to that committee, that will be the end of it. The majority of the Senate, Mr. President, can send the resolution to the committee—can stifle the resolution—but it can go there in no other way. A yea-and-nay vote of the Senate can declare that this Senate is not enough interested in the subject-matter to send this inquiry to the Secretary of State.

I might have made the resolution very much stronger. The Senator from Minnesota objects to the following language:

And whether or not the Department has informed the proper British authorities that if said detention is persisted in such act will be considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States.

I might have put into the resolution a motion to the Secretary of State that it is the sense of the Senate that he should so state to the British foreign office, but I have done nothing of that kind. I have simply asked the Secretary of State to report to us whether he has done that or not. In his reply, if he says that he has not, that ends it. I do not know, Mr. President, but what personally I should have been willing to have put in the stronger language of suggesting to or directing the Secretary of State to go as far as this, but I did not think in the scope of a resolution of inquiry I ought to do that. The Secretary of State is not instructed in any way in the matter. The resolution reads:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested—

That should be, of course, "directed." Such resolutions are always put in that way; and I will modify the resolution by making that change now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is that?

Mr. HALE. I modify the resolution by putting in the word "directed" instead of "requested," because that is the form the Senate always uses in resolutions touching the Departments.

That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to send to the Senate all information in the possession of the State Department relating to said seizure and detention—and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid.

Can anybody object to that?—

Not demanding—

Mr. HAWLEY. Why not stop right there?

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator to stop at that point; to strike out the remainder of the paragraph after the words "detained as aforesaid."

Mr. HALE. Certainly. I do not consider that the resolution is giving any instruction to the Department. I am entirely willing the resolution shall stop with the words "detained as aforesaid," and I will modify it in that way.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senator sure that the flour which has been taken is the property of American citizens? It has been stated again and again in the press that this flour was taken from an English ship, and was sent from here by a commission house which claims and asserts without dispute that its responsibility ceased when it sent its bill of lading to its English correspondents; that the whole controversy is between English subjects and the English Crown; that the flour was taken upon an English vessel, and that no American is making the slightest claim whatever for any damages by reason of the seizure of the flour. I ask the Senator if he has any information about that?

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what I am trying to find out. If the State Department has found that the facts are as indicated by the Senator from Colorado, it will send us that information at once, and we ought to have it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But that is not what the Senator says in his resolution. The Senator says, "Whereas property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized." If such property has not been so seized, we are a little premature.

Mr. HALE. But it is necessary to make certain statements as the foundation of a resolution. I have no question whatever that this property—I do not say that I know it, but I have no question—that it was the property of citizens of the United States, and it was so alleged in the newspapers at the time of the seizure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The New York World, or whatever paper it was, published that; but I understand the American consignors disavow any responsibility, and it is a question whether title did not pass upon the bill of lading being furnished to the English correspondents. I merely want the facts.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest that the Senator modify the first clause so as to read, "Whereas it is alleged;" then strike out all of the preamble after the word "Africa," and then strike out all of the resolution after the word "aforesaid," in line 6. I think with these changes the resolution would be passed by unanimous consent. It would then read:

Whereas it is alleged that property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain in or near Delagoa Bay, South Africa; Therefore,
Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby directed, etc.

Then let the language of the resolution stand as it now does down to the word "aforesaid," in line 6, and there stop.

Mr. HALE. That amendment has already been made.

Mr. STEWART. The last part has been amended, but not the first, I think.

Mr. DAVIS. Not in the first part.

Mr. COCKRELL. The first clause of the preamble has not been changed.

Mr. HALE. That was suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and I agreed to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What I wanted—I do not know whether or not it has been done—was, after the word "whereas," to insert "it is alleged that."

Mr. HALE. I agreed to that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So that the first "whereas" should read:

Whereas it is alleged that property of citizens of the United States, etc.

Mr. DAVIS. How about the second "whereas?"

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That has been amended.

Mr. HALE. Yes; and I agreed to the other amendment, too.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the last clause of the resolution been stricken out?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like at some time to put a question to the Senator from Maine, if I can get the opportunity.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to suggest that—

Mr. HALE. Let us have the changes in the resolution stated, Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read as it has been modified.

Mr. STEWART. My suggestion was to strike out all after the words "South Africa," in the first "whereas," and that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be inserted. Then I am sure there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut was, after the first word "whereas," to insert "it is alleged." I agreed to that, and the same words can be inserted after the word "whereas" in the second clause of the preamble.

Mr. STEWART. My suggestion is to strike out all after the words "South Africa."

Mr. HALE. You can not do that, because putting in the word "alleged" covers all that follows. It now reads that "it is alleged" that such and such has been done. That covers everything.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the first "whereas" be read as it now stands.

Mr. LODGE. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. FORAKER. Let the whole resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the entire resolution as it has been modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa, without good reason for the same, and contrary to the accepted principles of international law; and

Whereas it is alleged that said property is now unjustly detained by the military authorities of Great Britain, in disregard of the rights of the owners of the same; Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to send to the Senate all information in possession of the State Department relating to said seizure and detention, and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question, if I may be permitted—

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator understand that it is in accordance either with the usage of the Senate or with the proper conduct of our foreign relations to address such a direction as this to the Secretary of State? Do not such resolutions always go to the President, and do they not always reserve the President's discretion as to the interests of the public service?

It may be that an apparently harmless statement by the Senate, which is a part of the diplomatic authority of the Government, may, by reason of some misunderstanding, seriously and injuriously affect pending negotiations. A minister of the United States was removed on the alleged ground that he had stated on his own authority to a foreign Government that if they took a certain position, of course they would take it under their responsibility for the consequences. That was all. It was a position which the United States was combating and which the Administration, if necessary, would combat by force; but such a communication made it very difficult for the other party to yield.

I suppose, in deference to other Senators who are charged with the foreign relations of the country more particularly in the first instance, that the uniform course of the Senate in regard to matters affecting our foreign relations and under diplomatic discussion is to address a request to the President; that we should not intrude upon such a diplomacy by a peremptory direction to the Secretary of State to make public the negotiations in a pending case or other information of more or less importance. I have understood that that has been the custom of the Senate.

I wish to ask the Senator from Maine, Would it not be better to address this resolution to the President, with the usual reservation that he shall communicate the information if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, instead of going to the Secretary of State with this direction?

Mr. HALE. I thought of that in drawing the resolution, but I find that there are plenty of precedents, where information is sought simply as to current events, for directing the Secretary of State, like any other member of the Cabinet, to convey information to the Senate; and under those conditions I prefer that the resolution, which has now the formal matters connected with it adjusted and made satisfactory, I believe, to everybody, shall remain in its present form.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the resolution in its present modified form, as I understand it, but I want to ask the Senator from Maine if I understood him to say that food products could not be contraband of war?

Mr. HALE. I do not know, Mr. President, that I should say that under any circumstances and conditions food products may not be contraband of war, but it would take a very extreme condition to make contraband of war flour, corn, meat, things which are purely articles of commerce, not, as I have said, munitions of war nor arms nor explosives. I do not know but that such a case may be found where flour had been purchased for an army and was being transported directly to that army. It may be that under those conditions food products might be contraband. But I must remind the Senator that if any American Administration should go so far as to yield that point, it would be fraught with the greatest danger to us, not now but in any future war.

During the whole time when the empire, now the Republic, of France was overrun by the German armies, when war was going on in French territory and when France was raising armies in order to meet the Germans and to drive them off, if possible, we kept exporting flour, corn, and all sorts of breadstuffs and meat into French ports without Germany questioning it. I have no doubt that at that time such was the need of the French armies that if a cargo of flour was unloaded at Marseilles the French Government at once purchased, or, perhaps, before that time had purchased, it for their army, and yet Germany never thought of invoking this doctrine of "contraband of war" applying to food stuffs. While my answer to the Senator is that there might possibly be a case—an extreme case—where the powers of the world would agree that flour might be contraband, I can hardly imagine it, and I do not imagine that the State Department to-day is yielding that principle and is doing anything that in the future will get us into trouble in wars that may be waged by the European powers. I do not intimate that, but I do want the information, and as the resolution has been modified I hope it will pass.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I asked the question because, if my memory serves me correctly, we took very strong ground in regard to that subject at the time of the civil war, and I think we carried the doctrine a good deal further than Lord Stowell carried it when we made serious objections prior to the war of 1812, and I think the doctrine of "continuous voyage" has never been carried so far as we have carried it in the Springbok case and in some others.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will bear in mind that if we took, as he has stated, strong ground in this direction in the war of the rebellion, it was because we had established a blockade. That introduced a new feature, undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can not remember the cases to which I refer. These were cases where articles held to be contraband of war were taken to Nassau and Matamoros, to neutral ports, and our courts held that that only constituted a stage in the voyage; and as to the fact that they were sent to neutral ports, I think the language used was that it was simply one plank in the same wharf.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. It was on the way to break the blockade.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; but that was a question of fact and a matter of proof. If it could be shown that those products were for the use of the enemy in arms, we held the doctrine that they became contraband of war.

Now, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the validity of that doctrine, but the fact that we send flour to the Boers to-day or that we send flour to England to-day, as we are doing every day—we have an undoubted right to do it—does not affect the question of its being contraband of war, supposing either belligerent party think they can prove that it is to be used for a military purpose; that is, if we adhere to our own decisions. It seems to me that it opens up a somewhat delicate and doubtful case in view of the attitude on which we ourselves have insisted with great elaboration.

As I said, I have no objection to the resolution as it stands. I do think—I agree with my colleague entirely—that it ought to be addressed, as all of these diplomatic inquiries are addressed, to the President of the United States, because it is through him that we receive all our diplomatic information. It seems to me that it ought to be put in the usual form, to the President of the United States, if not inconsistent with the public interest, and I hope that modification may be made.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the preamble and the resolution have been very considerably modified by putting in the words "it is alleged" in the two branches of the preamble, and by striking out the concluding phrase in the resolution styling the conduct of Great Britain, in a certain contingency, as "without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States." But I do not like it now. If we are beginning a serious discussion with Great Britain, which may have serious results, we should do it in that dignified and courteous style which befits a great nation in the face of possible serious eventualities. This is not a diplomatic paper, as it stands now, and it was worse before, of course, because it conveyed a veiled threat of war, and that is not the way to meet an argument with European powers, especially Great Britain.

Now, I have no doubt that that Government will be disposed to do anything within reason to maintain friendly relations with us. There now exists between these two countries that courtesy which, as the poet says, "befits nations ancient foes, turned friends."

I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In view of the relations that the committee holds to the President and Secretary of State, it would not be difficult, in a private, informal conference, to find out the condition of this affair, and whether it would be agreeable to the Administration to disclose the present situation of the negotiations. And that brings me to another criticism.

Most unquestionably this inquiry ought to be directed to the President of the United States, with the usual caveat, because as it stands now the President of the United States might be very well aware of certain facts, certain language, etc., which it would not be wise to give to the public, but he can not exercise that discretion under the resolution as it reads now. It "directs" the Secretary of State to send to the Senate certain information. The President can not command the Secretary of State under this to omit certain parts of the correspondence. I think it is quite wrong, and I think the better way is to put the resolution in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that it may study the true situation and advise us as to what is the wisest thing for us to say.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is laboring under a false impression as to the power of the Executive in this matter. I understand that the Secretary of State, like every other member of the Cabinet, is subordinate to the President of the United States. Of course there are thousands of things done in the Departments about which the President knows nothing, but they are supposed to be done by his authority. A very important matter of any kind coming before a Cabinet officer—I mean involving a question that might get us into trouble with a foreign power and things of that kind—would naturally go to the President. The Cabinet officer would go there with it and consult the President. The President has the authority to say to any Cabinet officer, "You decline to answer that if you think it ought not to be answered."

I wish to suggest to the Senator another thing. The words we put in—to inform us, if he does not think it incompatible with the public interest—are words simply of courtesy and nothing else, and the resolution goes to the President with exactly the same force, and no more, with the words out than it would with the words in. We could not compel the President of the United States to send us information that he believed it contrary to the public interest to send. There is no way in which we can do that. Yet, of course, if we found that he was withholding that which we thought ought to be sent here, we could impeach him, and we could impeach him just as well with those words out of the resolution as with the words in. We should keep in mind all the time that we direct these officers simply because it is supposed to be a little more in accord with our dignity to say to a Cabinet officer, "You do this," and we request the President when we address him personally because it is more dignified and proper with reference to his high office that we should request of him.

There is no difficulty about this matter. If the Secretary of State thinks there is any trouble about it, he will consult the President, and if the President thinks there is any impropriety in the request, we will find it out by a declaration from the Secretary of State that it is considered incompatible with the public interest to give the information.

I want to say one word now about the contraband question—not that I am going into any discussion of it. Food may be contraband of war under certain conditions, as the Senator from Maine says. Those conditions are pretty well understood. Our relations with the commerce of the world during the war of the rebellion were very different from those of most nations, because there were two things we were asserting: First, that this was our country, and while certain governments had recognized the belligerency of these people, we insisted all the time that their relations existing with us were different from those which would exist if it were a foreign war; and we maintained a blockade on the coast, which we had to do after the declaration that these people were entitled to belligerent rights.

Now, I do not understand that when we ship to Europe food of any kind it is contraband of war because somebody in Europe may ship it to a country engaged in war; and the Senator from Massachusetts will have to hunt a good deal to find that we have laid down any such international law as that. We can not afford to do that. Mr. President, there will not be any difficulty about this matter. If Great Britain has seized our flour which was on its way to a neutral port, although she may think it is going into a hostile region to feed some people, she is not going to hold it. If there are any people in the world who are interested in maintaining the principle that food is not contraband of war it is Great Britain. She is not going to say, for the purpose of this affair down there, which is a small affair, that food is contraband on the high seas. If food is contraband so are mules, and Great Britain is buying mules in this country and shipping them directly to Africa for use in the army; and if anybody should complain of our shipping flour we may complain of their shipping mules also.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. It is for a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether he understands the language "and contrary to the accepted principles of international law" to be an announcement on the part of the Senate that we consider it a breach of international law, or does that come in under the general phrase "it is alleged?"

Mr. HALE. That is right; that is it.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose it would come under the general phrase "it is alleged." There are conditions where food is contraband of war. For instance, where a fort is besieged the rule is that you can not introduce it into that fort. That is contraband of war.

Mr. WOLCOTT. You can not introduce what?

Mr. TELLER. Food.

Mr. BACON. The question I desire to ask the Senator is this: If that is the construction which it is intended by the author of the resolution shall be put, simply that it is alleged to be contrary to the accepted principles of international law—

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; it is alleged to be contrary, and if the Department shows us a condition of affairs which makes it contraband that is the end of it.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand, in other words, that this resolution announces as a proposition adjudicated by the Senate that it is contraband of war.

Mr. TELLER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HALE. I should have put in those words in drawing the resolution if I had thought of them. The moment the Senator from Connecticut yesterday or the other day suggested them, I agreed that they ought to go in; and they cover all that follows.

Mr. TELLER. I think so.

Mr. President, this question of contraband articles of war has been somewhat modified and enlarged of late years. There has been a disposition to hold that coal is contraband of war, as well as other things. But I do not myself have any uneasiness about what will happen. I am satisfied, from what I see in the public press, that the Government has taken steps in this matter. The newspapers tell us that our Government has submitted the whole matter to the British Government, and they have agreed to reply when they become familiar with the facts. The newspapers tell us that they have already returned the flour to the parties who claimed it. Whether that is true or not we do not know. We will know when we get the answer to this resolution.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the resolution as it has now been modified seems to be unobjectionable in form, but the question whether it is wise to adopt the resolution at this time still remains, and the more I think of it the more I think it is unwise for the Senate, while a contention of this kind is pending between the Executive Departments and the representatives of the British Government, for the Senate to interfere, not that we do not have the right to do so, although I think we ought to address our resolution to the President of the United States, with the usual qualification, that if he does not think it incompatible with the interest of the public service he shall communicate the information to the Senate.

The Secretary of State does not stand exactly in the same relation to the legislative department that the other Secretaries of Departments do. The Secretary of State is not required by law to report to Congress. All other Cabinet officers, if I am not mistaken, are required by law to report to Congress. The Secretary of State has been exempted from that requirement for the very reason that his duties are mainly diplomatic, carried on with foreign countries and upon matters which may be very delicate and which may involve us in serious embarrassments if the negotiations during their pendency are reported to Congress.

Mr. President, is there anything in this case which makes it necessary that the Senate shall depart from its usual custom and call upon the Secretary of State to report the exact conditions of the negotiations which are pending between our diplomatic officers and the diplomatic officers of Great Britain? I think not. I think, on the contrary, from all that we hear, that the negotiations are being conducted with propriety and with earnestness and in a way which is likely to lead to a satisfactory conclusion. Under all these circumstances, I think it is unwise to pass the resolution. If there was any disposition apparent in any way on the part of the Secretary of State, representing the President, not to deal energetically with this matter, that might be a reason why we should ask that all the information in his possession should be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume, of course, that the Senator from Connecticut is aware that the newspapers contain reports, more or less largely circulated, that there is an agreement or understanding between the United States and Great Britain, and it is at least suspected by some Americans that that is true. There is, furthermore, an idea that this Administration is more friendly to Great Britain than it is to the Boers, and with that view I presume the Senator from Maine desired to have the direct information as to whether those newspaper insinuations had any foundation in fact. We can get that in no other way so clearly and so positively as by letting the diplomatic officers of this Government tell us just what they have done, so as to find out whether the rights of American commerce have been invaded, and whether the American Administration is taking the necessary steps to see that the right of search, for which the war of 1812 was fought, is not being set up here at this late day, or that we are submitting to even greater indignities than we did then.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is quite a long inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not make it as an inquiry, but as throwing some light on the course of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I would very much prefer that the Senator from South Carolina should illuminate my remarks after they are entirely completed. But if, as the Senator from South Carolina intimates, the motive for the introduction of the resolution is founded upon a suspicion that our Government will not assert its rights as against the English Government, then it is an additional reason why I do not wish to vote for this resolution. I have no such suspicion. I believe that the President and Secretary of State will vigorously and rigorously insist upon the rights of the citizens of this country. I am rather glad to be illuminated by the Senator from South Carolina as to the motive which underlies, as he supposes, the introduction of this resolution, which is that there is a suspicion that our Government will not deal earnestly and vigorously in upholding the rights of commerce of American citizens.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume the Senator has seen in the papers that we are shipping mules to the British army for purposes purely military, and that our markets are open to Great Britain because she has a fleet and can get her supplies across the ocean without any interruption, whereas Delagoa Bay is in Portuguese territory and is the only outlet or port of the Boers. It does seem to me that every American is interested in having equality of trade and equality of opportunity on the part of the Boers to get munitions of war, whether flour or what not, in the same way that England is getting them here in the open market without any protest or effort on the part of this Government or anybody else to restrain them. And England should not be permitted to interfere with our commerce to a neutral port.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I understand international law, there is no inhibition upon any American citizen selling and shipping supplies of any sort to governments or to individuals representing governments who are engaged in war. They do it at their own risk. If the goods are seized in transitu, then the question arises whether they are contraband of war. This is a question which our Government considers.

But I am not to be diverted from the point I was making, that I do not believe it wise, just at this stage of the negotiations, to call upon the Secretary of State or the President to tell us exactly what representations he has made and exactly what replies he is getting from the representatives of the English Government in the discussion which is going on between the two Governments.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will my colleague pardon me an interruption? He says "call or request." He will note that this is a demand and a command.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Exact'y. I have said all that I desire to say.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Maine allow me for just a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he has objection to further amending his resolution so as to address the inquiry to the President instead of the Secretary of State? I think there are a good many Senators here who would have no objection at all to the resolution in that form who do object to it in its present form. I myself would prefer to vote for the resolution, if I vote for it at all, in the amended form suggested.

I have no idea that there is any alliance such as has been suggested, and I have no sympathy with the theory that there are any grounds for suspicion as to motive or anything else. I assume that the Senator from Maine introduced the resolution simply because he wanted this information, and it was certainly competent for him to ask the Senate to make the inquiry if he saw fit. The only objection I have to his resolution is the form in which he puts it. I think, as he has already suggested as to another part of it, that this is accidental. Therefore, I suggest to him that we amend by striking out the words "Secretary of State" in line 2 and inserting the word "President;" then, at the beginning of line 3, insert "if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest;" and in line 4, after the word "said" and before the word "seizure," insert the word "alleged." That will not change at all the spirit or purposes or scope of the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. "Directed" should be changed to "requested."

Mr. FORAKER. It reads "requested."

Mr. DAVIS. That was changed. It should be changed back.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know that it had been changed. The word "requested" should remain. If it was stricken out and the word "directed" inserted, I ask that it be changed back to the word originally used.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator from Ohio through?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes. Has the Senator from Maine any objection to those changes?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there never was presented to the Senate a clearer resolution simply of inquiry, propounding no facts, but merely stating that there were allegations upon which to base the resolution, than the one I hold in my hand. Every amendment which has been suggested to me has been readily accepted, because the amendments were of form and somewhat of substance; and yet they tended to shear the resolution of any possible objection. Still Senators are not satisfied. It is said that we should not put inquiries now while negotiations are going on with Great Britain. Negotiations! There is no treaty being negotiated. The Government undoubtedly has presented its request for the restoration of this property, and it is not a matter of give and take between the two powers, the Government of the United States and Great Britain. It is simply whether or not Great Britain is to-day disposed, instead of yielding to this request of ours, to delay and procrastinate after the fashion of British diplomacy; and if that is so, I want to know it. I think the Senate wants to know it. I know the country wants to know it.

I am not afraid, as the Senator from Connecticut is, that we shall overstep the bounds by passing this resolution, one simply of inquiry for information. I am not afraid we shall be doing the undiplomatic thing when we do this. But Senators are not content, no matter how the resolution is framed or is drawn or amended; but the determination is that it shall not pass the Senate. I do not know that it will pass the Senate. I for one will consent to no further amendments. I should like a vote of the Senate at once, and if we can get it I will take no more time upon this proposition to stifle the resolution by referring it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the Senate wants to do that, let it do it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Maine will not think I had in view any purpose of stifling his resolution. On the contrary, I tried to facilitate the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I did not refer to the Senator from Ohio, of course.

Mr. FORAKER. I regret to hear the Senator announce that he will not accept the amendments which I suggested on the floor a moment ago. I trust he will reconsider that. It does not affect the substance of the resolution, and if he does not accept them, it will necessitate my moving that the resolution be so amended.

Mr. HALE. I will not. I like it better in its present form. The Senator can move the amendments, and if the Senate adopts them, that ends it. I want a vote of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I move, then—

Mr. CHANDLER. A motion to refer is pending.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I move to strike out, in line 2, the words "Secretary of State" and insert "President;" at the beginning of line 3, to insert the words "if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest;" and by inserting the word "alleged" after the word "said" in line 4 and before the word "seizure."

Mr. DAVIS. At the present stage of the question I withdraw, with leave, the motion to refer the resolution to the committee.

Mr. HALE. I did not hear the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws the motion to refer the resolution to the committee. The resolution is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amendments of the Senator from Ohio are pending.

Mr. FORAKER. I had the floor to move an amendment.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let them be reported.

Mr. DAVIS. Let them be read.

Mr. HALE. Let them be read, but treated as one amendment instead of voting on each clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, strike out the words "Secretary of State" and insert the word "President;" in the same line, strike out the word "directed" and insert "requested;" at the end of the line, after the word "Senate," insert "if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interests;" and in line 4, before the word "seizure," insert the word "alleged;" so that if amended the resolution would read:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the President is hereby requested to send to the Senate, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, all information in possession of the State Department relating to said alleged seizure and detention, and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid.

Mr. HALE. Now let us have a vote.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say one word. I favor the amendment directing a request to the President.

I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maine that the practical effect is the same. I do not question whatever our right to direct the Secretary of State to furnish information, but in a matter whenever, in the opinion of the President, the information directed to be furnished by a Cabinet officer should not be conveyed to the Senate, there would doubtless be received by us from the President a communication to the effect that the information could not, in his opinion, be properly communicated to the Senate at this time. So, practically, it would be the same thing.

I do not conceive that the Senator from Colorado is entirely correct in his statement that in a case where the Senate directs a Cabinet officer, if it should be deemed by him improper or incompatible with the public interest that the information should be given, we would receive a reply of that kind from the Cabinet officer. A Cabinet officer should certainly never be considered as authorized to return such a reply.

I think that the reason why the Senate directs a Cabinet officer is not simply that this is a legislative body, but because it is also a part of the executive branch. Whenever that direction to a Cabinet officer would, if complied with, work a public harm, we would receive that information through the President. So, practically, it is the same, and I think, as originally was suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, and as has been again suggested by the Senator from Ohio and others, it is decidedly better that this resolution should be made to accord with what is more proper usage, relating, as it does, to a matter concerning our foreign relations.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Maine will himself consent to this change, or rather not oppose it, in order that the resolution may be in such form as will meet the approval of all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Maine to accept the amendments?

Mr. HALE. It is a question for the Senate to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the preamble, the Chair is informed.

Mr. HALE. That will go with the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be taken as the sense of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BERRY. I asked unanimous consent that the Senate might consider a bill that will take only a few minutes, and I gave way to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I now ask that the bill be considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, I wish to make a privileged motion. It will take but a moment.

Mr. BERRY. I have given way three times, but if the Senator insists—

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I shall have to make it as a privileged motion. It is only that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have another resolution on the table which came over from yesterday.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will let me have my bill passed. It will take but a few minutes. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN CUBA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which he will indicate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not wish to have the resolution to which I refer displaced and go to the Calendar at 2 o'clock; that is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that the resolution which the Senator from South Dakota wants to have taken up is not objected to now, and it will take but a few moments, I think.

Mr. BERRY. All right; I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution coming over from yesterday.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate an itemized statement of public receipts from taxation, customs, and all other sources, and also of public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses, in Cuba since the United States Government assumed control of that island.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments for information.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line 3 of the resolution, after the word "sources," to insert the words "collected in Cuba;" and in line 5, after the word "Cuba," to insert "out of revenue so collected."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator from South Dakota will modify his own resolution, and the amendments are accepted as a part of the original resolution. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

CUBAN VESSELS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 734) relating to Cuban vessels. I will state that the bill is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That vessels owned by citizens of Cuba and documented as such by officers of the United States shall hereafter be entitled in ports of the United States to the rights and privileges of vessels of the most favored nation, and they and their cargoes shall be subject to no higher charges in ports of the United States than are imposed on the vessels and cargoes of the most favored nation in the same trade.

Mr. BERRY. The committee recommend that the second section be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out section 2 in the following words:

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon application and satisfactory evidence, tonnage taxes and light dues which have been imposed on vessels owned by citizens of Cuba entering ports of the United States since January 1, 1899, which have been in excess of the tonnage taxes prescribed by section 11 of the act of June 19, 1889.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. With regard to the bill which has just passed, I see no objection to it, but I do want to say that I think all measures relating to the island of Cuba and our relations to it should hereafter be referred to the committee which has that matter in charge.

Mr. BERRY. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the Presiding Officer of the Senate; it was referred to the Committee on Commerce; it was taken up there for consideration; and I understood him to say, either about this bill or some other, that he had conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and that that chairman had said it was best to let the Committee on Commerce dispose of the bill. It was unanimously recommended by all the members of the committee, after striking out the section which directed the repayment of the fees to the parties, and I was requested by the chairman to report it. That is all I know about it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am making no complaint, only I hope in the future that such bills will go to the proper committee.

AGREEMENT WITH BANNOCK AND SHOSHONE INDIANS.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 255) to ratify an agreement made with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, in Idaho, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that a bill on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is No. 72 upon the Calendar. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information, subject to objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LODGE. This bill, I understand, has passed the Senate at a previous session, and I ask that the further reading may be dispensed with. It is very nearly 2 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. That can not be done. We can not dispense with its reading because of the fact that it was passed at a former session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules of the Senate will not permit the reading to be dispensed with. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill and was interrupted by

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to place before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside, so that the consideration of this bill may be concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of finishing the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. I feel obliged to object to that, Mr. President. Let this bill come up to-morrow.

Mr. SHOUP. Then I make the request that immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning the bill be taken up, the reading completed, and that it be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notice will be taken.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I beg leave to say in this connection that yesterday I gave notice that immediately after the morning business to-morrow I should desire to submit some remarks to the Senate on the joint resolution which I introduced, and I understood that that was the order.

Mr. SHOUP. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that, in my judgment, this bill will not occupy five minutes.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I understand that the Senate has agreed that when it adjourns to-day it shall be to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow, and I should not like to be interfered with by this measure, as the time will be short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the special notice given by the Senator from Maryland will take precedence when the time arrives. The unfinished business will now be proceeded with.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, in view of the great pressure thrown upon the Senate by the consideration of various measures, I feel it my duty to ask the Senate to fix a time for taking the vote upon the pending bill. I am sure this course will meet the convenience of all Senators, and I trust there will be no objection to the suggestion which I shall make.

I request that the vote may be taken upon the pending bill and amendments on Thursday, the 1st day of February, at some time during the legislative day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Rhode Island knows very well that there are a number of Senators on this side who desire to be heard on this bill. A good many of them are engaged with matters of public importance that makes it impossible for them to prepare at once, as they might do if there was nothing before the Senate but this bill. But there are a number of other public questions of great importance in which almost all Senators are interested, and I do not think it is possible for this side of the Senate to be ready to take a vote on the bill as early as the time indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island. I suggest, as a substitute, that we agree to vote on the 15th of February, which I think will be satisfactory to all sides.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am extremely anxious to consult the convenience of Senators in regard to this matter and I understand the force of the remarks made by the Senator from Arkansas. With that in view, I accept the suggestion made by that Senator and will agree that the time shall be fixed for Thursday, the 15th of February, at some time during the legislative day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That will be entirely satisfactory, I think, to this side. There ought to be the further understanding, however, that the time after 2 o'clock from now until then shall be devoted to the consideration of this bill, if gentlemen desire to occupy the floor at any time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; that should be the understanding. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that that should be the understanding.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There should be another thing understood, I think, Mr. President. There should be one or two days devoted to the discussion of amendments proposed to the bill under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. Two days.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should think we ought to have two full days on which amendments are to be discussed under the ten-minute rule. We all understand that as we approach the hour to vote it is often the case that there is not sufficient time to consider amendments that gentlemen desire to offer.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree to that suggestion. I think it is very wise that there should be time given for the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. With this understanding, I do not think there will be any difficulty about an agreement.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the understanding, as I understand it, is that we shall vote upon this bill and pending amendments on Thursday—some time during Thursday—the 15th of February, and that two days prior to that time shall be given to the discussion—

Mr. ALLISON. Including the 15th.

Mr. ALDRICH. That two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule, with the further understanding that pending that time, or during the time between now and the 15th of February, this bill shall remain the unfinished business after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the request. It is that by unanimous consent it be agreed that the pending financial bill, House bill No. 1, shall be discussed from time to time as it is found expedient to do so, and that the final vote shall be taken upon its passage on February 15—

Mr. ALDRICH. Hardly "discussed from time to time as may be found expedient," Mr. President. It should be the regular order, as before.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the request be stated in the words in which it was taken down.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the request made by me be read by the stenographer. I think there will be no trouble about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reporter will please read the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the understanding, as I understand it, is that we shall vote upon this bill and pending amendments on Thursday—some time during Thursday—the 15th of February, and that two days prior to that time shall be given to the discussion—

Mr. ALLISON. Including the 15th.

Mr. ALDRICH. That two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule, with the further understanding that pending that time, or during the time between now and the 15th of February, this bill shall remain the unfinished business after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the proposed agreement as read?

Mr. BURROWS. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island whether it would not be well that we fix some time for the final vote on that day?

Mr. COCKRELL and others. No, no.

Mr. BURROWS. If it includes the legislative day, the legislative day may last a week or longer, and I suggest whether it would not be well to fix an hour for the final vote.

Mr. TELLER. We will vote before adjournment.

Mr. BURROWS. But I think we should fix some hour.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As it has been agreed to discuss amendments for two days under the ten-minute rule, I think the Senate will get through the discussion on the amendments and there will be no reason then for postponing the vote a single hour; but if there should be amendments which Senators think of sufficient importance to be offered and which they wish to discuss, they are to be discussed on that day under the ten-minute rule, and I think the Senate ought to remain in session until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. BURROWS. I merely made the suggestion. I am afraid that the agreement will lead to a very protracted session on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection to the agreement as read by the Reporter, the same will be taken as the sense of the Senate. It is so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the financial question has been before the American people for a quarter of a century. Other great questions are now coming to the front. These are questions that will tax our best efforts—questions so great that errors in judgment or a lack of conscience and courage to do our duty in respect to them may imperil our national existence, and concerning which if our mistakes are not fatal they are likely to be at least injurious to the American people.

But with all these other great questions before us we can not get rid of the monetary question, the greatest of all, because our ability to settle these other problems rightfully may depend on our success in dealing with the financial problem. This is true because a great number of intelligent men throughout the world believe the best interests of mankind require that the world should return to the bimetallic system; because all the commercial world is now disturbed by the attempt to displace nearly one-half of the metal money of the world without providing anything to take its place; because, in the language of the Republican platform of 1892, "the American people from tradition and interest are in favor of bimetalism;" because the American people are opposed to the gold standard and believe in the use of gold and silver as standard money.

Those who have been crying out for a decade that the silver question is dead and will "no longer vex the people of this or any other country," should remember, to use a trite phrase, that in free countries no question is settled until it is settled right.

It is possible the continued agitation of this question may disturb commerce and trade, that it may make the holders of money fear that the purchasing power of the dollar may be reduced, and their grip on the industrial energies and production of the country be weakened; but, be this as it may, the contest will go on. It will go on, because righteousness and justice are with those who contend for a system of finance that shall not impoverish one class, and that class the great bulk of society, that another and a smaller class may be enriched.

Mr. President, I always have some delicacy in discussing this question, because of the oft-repeated charge which has been made against myself and others who come from the silver-producing regions of the country, that we are controlled in our support of the bimetallic system by our local interests. That charge has been made against me repeatedly in the public press and sometimes on the floor of the Senate.

I represent in part one of the great precious-metal States of this Union—the greatest of them all at the present time. When I first came into this Chamber there was a greater production of gold in the State of Colorado than of silver, and for many years thereafter there was a greater production of silver than of gold; but upon this question I took my position when I came here, and I have not had occasion to doubt the correctness of my judgment at that time on the policy which the Government ought to pursue with reference to its finances.

At the present time Colorado is the greatest gold-producing State in the Union, having produced last year between thirty-three and thirty-four million dollars' worth of that metal. The State produced more than twice as much in value of gold as it did of silver. Indeed, Colorado is not only a great gold and silver producing State, but it is rich in all the metals, precious and otherwise. It contains great quantities of lead, copper, manganese, and zinc. Besides these, it has other great interests. Its agricultural interest is equal, if not greater, even at the present time, than its mining interest. I have thought it well to state these facts to convince you that the silver interest of the State is not paramount. If I know myself, I do not come here to discuss this question because the interests of the people of Colorado are involved in it.

I know, of course, that if silver was at its old price some of the mines in Colorado which are now closed would be opened; and I know, even though the amount of silver produced were no greater in weight than now, it would be worth in the markets of the world more than twice as much as it was last year. But, as I have said before, this is not a question for the people of one locality. It is not a question of what are the interests of the silver-producing States, although I believe that may properly be kept in mind in legislating upon this subject.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND BIMETALLISM.

It has been my fortune to be in public life since this question became an active one. I recall the debates in the Senate and in the House of Representatives in 1877 and 1878. And looking back over the field, I think I may assert here without fear of contradiction that the American people are now and have been in favor of bimetallicism.

Until very recently there was no political organization willing to take the position before the people of this country in opposition to bimetallicism. The Republican party, with which I had been connected from its organization and with which I had acted during most of my public life, was until within the past few years a pronounced bimetallic party. Twenty-three years ago, if there was any distinction between the parties on this great question, the Republican party was the most enthusiastic and aggressive. I am speaking now of the rank and file of the people. All of our public men of both the great political parties have been declaring that they were opposed to the single gold standard. I know that a high and great question of this kind is to some extent belittled by considering, and it would seem beneath the dignity of this body to consider, what has been the action of a political organization on this subject.

Yet, Mr. President, because of my relations to it and because I have felt compelled, on account of the attitude of the political party with which I acted for so many years on this subject, to abandon it, I think it will not be inappropriate or out of place if I shall call attention to the course of the Republican party on this question during the last twenty-odd years. Whatever may be thought of the propriety or the policy of it, I feel that I must at least refer to it.

Mr. President, I represent a constituency who have studied this question. I represent a people composed of those who formerly were citizens of all sections of the United States, and I venture to say here, now, that there is to-day no more cosmopolitan society within the borders of the United States than that found in the State of Colorado; and, if it be not considered out of place, I would say that there is not to be found a greater number of men in any other section of the country who have more intelligence, more patriotism, and more learning than have the people of Colorado.

We are bimetallicists in Colorado. There is no political organization there that does not declare for bimetallicism. The Republican party there in their political conventions vie with the Democratic party, with the Silver Republicans, and the Populists in asserting that they are for bimetallicism.

I recall that only a few years ago the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], standing in this Chamber, declared that 90 per cent of the people of the United States were in favor of bimetallicism. The Senator from Massachusetts must have reconsidered his position, or else he must feel that this bill, offered by the party to which he belongs, is out of place in this body.

ORIGIN OF THE BILL.

I said the other day that this was a caucus measure. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] took me to task for that statement. I know, Mr. President, that in discussing a great measure of this kind to say that it is a caucus measure is not sufficient to condemn it. The question will be upon the merits of the proposition, and those I propose eventually to discuss. But there was something said by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in his discussion of the bill the other day, coupled with the subsequent declaration he made that he knew of nobody else on his side of the Chamber who intended to discuss the measure, which will justify me in speaking of this as a caucus measure.

I said then, and I now repeat, that perhaps it is not a caucus measure of Republicans who have got together and presented the bill as the result of their best judgment; but it is a measure that a junta of self-constituted political economists, as they call themselves, in the city of Indianapolis prepared for this Senate and House of Representatives. A Republican commission, appointed by the Republican caucus, accepted this, and it came to the House of Representatives—I speak now of the House bill—as the work, not of any one House committee, but as the work of a committee sitting at some watering place. It did not have the courtesy of the consideration of any House committee or of any member of a House committee. I do not think it is either out of place or improper to characterize this proceeding as the most remarkable in the history of legislative bodies.

Mr. President, the student of history will declare that this is a departure from and an abdication of legislative judgment, when a committee composed of half a dozen men ignorant upon this question—for their ignorance is shown by almost every line that they have ever written—shall be able to present a bill to the great legislature of the United States and it will accept it without even the consideration of a committee. If this is not an abandonment of the legislative function and a surrender to outside political influences there never was an abandonment or a surrender.

This bill came from the other House to this body after only a week's discussion there. In the Senate it went to the Committee on Finance, which we have selected to pass upon financial questions. I do not think I shall be outside the bounds of truth if I say that that committee, as a committee, never considered the pending bill an hour; that it was never considered in committee with the cooperation of those of its members of different political faith than its framers.

Mr. President, this bill is here dictated by influences not legislative; and when I stand here to protest against it, no man knows better than I do that the great political party in power and dominating this Senate and the country has surrendered its judgment and its conscience to that outside influence, and yet that it will receive the almost united support of that political organization.

I know very well that the policy of the bill is contrary to the repeated declarations of that party in convention and out. It will be different from their action in this Chamber and in the other for twenty years. But that party is in the hands of a power from which it can not escape, and it will go on and put upon the statute books this legislation, because it is impotent to resist that power, although the proposed legislation may be, and I know is, against the judgment of very many Senators of that political party.

Up to 1896 the Republican party in this country was a bimetallic party. In 1888 it declared for silver. I will go back of that time and I call attention to the legislation of 1876, when a large number of Republicans, a majority of them in the House of Representatives, were in favor of the free coinage of silver. I will call attention to the fact that the most prominent men then sitting in the other House voted for that measure. I will also call attention to the further fact that the present Chief Executive of the nation as late as 1890 was writing letters to his constituents in the State of Ohio and asserting as a merit in his public service that he had voted for that bill.

In 1890 the country was suffering from a lack of money, and when the House of Representatives was not in full accord with the Senate upon this question, when the Senate passed the free-coinage bill, the Republican party as a party, acting together in this body and in the other House, framed and secured the passage of the statute known as the Sherman Act of July 14, 1890. That was an act professedly in the interest of bimetallicism; but I did not believe then that it was a judicious act to pass. Still it had in it some redeeming qualities. It was professedly, I say, in the interest of bimetallicism. The Republican party was then vying with the Democratic party as to which should be the most extreme in favor of bimetallicism. The only objection made here against free coinage by Republicans in the twenty-odd years I have been familiar with this legislation has been simply that it was a hindrance to bimetallicism. The most extreme gold men of to-day who were then in this Chamber were wont to assert that we were rendering it impossible to secure bimetallicism by our extreme action. That end, they said, was not to be attained through free coinage.

I have a few extracts from the platforms of the different Republican conventions of the United States from time to time on this question, but I do not care to read them. I will ask permission that I may put them in the RECORD. I ask this privilege in justification of what I have here said, and also in justification of my continuance in the Republican party so long as I did remain in it. If the Republican party in 1890 had declared it was a gold-standard party, I should have severed my connection with it then. There are few men in public life who have had more honors at the hands of their political party than I have had at the hands of the Republican party; but I received those honors, Mr. President, because I was supposed to represent Republican ideas and Republican principles. I have advocated the free coinage of silver on every stump in the State from which I come, and there has never until within the last two years been a convention in Colorado of either Democrats or Republicans that has not declared for the free coinage of silver; and while there has been some letting down, perhaps, in one direction, still all parties now declare for bimetallicism.

I will say that I have here the declarations of the Republican conventions of Iowa, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, and Pennsylvania. I will not say that Pennsylvania declared for free coinage, but that State did declare for "the use of silver and gold." I have also the declarations of South Dakota, Tennessee, Wyoming, California, Colorado, Michigan, and others.

Mr. President, I will now send up the extracts which I desire to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The extracts referred to by the Senator from Colorado will, without objection, be printed as a part of his remarks.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

Michigan Republicans in 1890: We indorse the action of Congress upon the silver question and favor the unlimited use of gold and silver as the basis of legal-tender paper currency interchangeable with coin.

Nebraska, 1890 or 1891: The Republican party has given the people an elastic currency of gold, silver, and paper, and has raised the credit of the nation to one of the highest pitch of any country in the world, and its efforts to fully remonetize silver should be continued until it is on a perfect equality as a money metal with gold.

The New York Republican State convention in 1890-91 commended the Administration for "the prompt restoration of silver to its normal place in the commercial world."

Ohio, 1891: Approved of the action of Congress in fulfilling pledges of the party in legislation upon the coinage of silver, revision of the tariff, etc.

Oregon, April 16, 1891: We declare ourselves in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and denounce any attempt to discriminate against silver as unwise and unjust.

Pennsylvania, June 25, 1891: Favored the use of both gold and silver. Iowa Republicans in their platform of 1893: We are in favor of maintaining both gold and silver money as unlimited legal tender for the payment of debts; and in doing this Congress shall provide that every dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, shall be kept of equal value.

Kansas, 1892: Favors such laws as will increase the coinage of silver. Approval of international bimetallicism.

Missouri Republican convention, 1892: Favors international bimetallicism. Montana, 1892: Free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Nebraska, 1893: Adopts the national platform of 1892 as to the silver question.

Nevada: Free and unlimited coinage of silver. Oregon: Indorses the Sherman bill.

Pennsylvania, 1893: Reaffirms the national platform on the money question and demands $40 per capita.

South Dakota, 1892: Reaffirms the national platform on silver. Tennessee, 1892: Approves of the Sherman Act.

Wyoming, 1892: The money of the country should be founded on gold and silver, and this may be achieved by timely legislation—international conference.

California, 1892: We believe silver, equally with gold, to be the money of the people.

Colorado, 1892: Free and unlimited coinage of silver.

THE ST. LOUIS CONVENTION AND THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, with this record I remained in the Republican party. I went to St. Louis as a delegate to the national Republican convention, authorized by the people of my State to go there, instructed by them to stand for the free coinage of silver. That there should be no misunderstanding where I stood, I telegraphed the convention that under no circumstances, whether I was a delegate or not, would I support a candidate who did not stand on a bimetallic platform and who did not favor the use of silver and gold on equal terms.

I had doubted before I went to St. Louis whether such a declaration would be made by that convention, but this was not because the candidate who it was recognized would be nominated was opposed to silver, for all his utterances in public and in private life had been in favor of bimetallicism. As I have said, he had voted for free coinage, and when the bill was amended here in this body so as not to be a free-coinage bill, but yet to be a bill that was claimed to be more in the line of securing what we all wanted, the concurrent action of mankind on this question, the international obligation of all people to continue the use of silver—when it was said that was more potent in that direction than the other, and when the President of the United States vetoed the bill, because he said its passage and its execution would be a breach of public faith—the present Executive, then a member of the House of Representatives, voted to pass that bill over the veto.

I think before the convention met at St. Louis it was as well understood that Mr. McKinley would be the Republican candidate for the Presidency as it was when the convention adjourned. We had a right from his declarations to suppose that his influence would be in favor of bimetallicism. The State from which he came, in its convention, had passed a resolution on that subject, which I shall read. It was passed on the 11th day of March, 1896, and is as follows:

We contend for honest money, for a currency of gold, silver, and paper with which to measure our exchanges that shall be as sound as the Government and as untarnished as its honor; and to that end we favor bimetallicism and demand the use of both gold and silver as standard money, either in accordance with a ratio to be fixed by an international agreement, if that can be obtained, or under such restrictions and such provisions to be determined by legislation as will secure the maintenance of the parities of value of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

That was a bimetallic declaration, which went out from the State of Ohio, where the Presidential candidate lived, and we had some right to suppose that that might be the national declaration. When I reached St. Louis I was told by a number of prominent men that that would be the platform. There are men I can recall who remember that conversation, to whom I said, "No such declaration will be in your platform; your party is under the control and in the hands of men who do not intend to have bimetallicism, either national or international."

Mr. President, of late there has been a quarrel among leading Republicans of this country as to who should be awarded the honor of securing this change in the policy of that great political party; as to who should have the honor of repudiating the Ohio resolution and adopting one recognizing, in the first place, the gold standard as existing in this country, and then declaring that it shall be maintained, at the same time asserting that it is not the most desirable standard in the world, but that when somebody else, some foreign power, shall be kind enough to allow us, the greatest people in the world, to direct our own financial system, then it may be changed and we should have the bimetallic standard. The convention of 1888 had declared for silver. I believe I can put my eye upon that declaration, and I will read it. In 1888 at Chicago—I believe I shall commit no impropriety if I say it—the distinguished Senator from Nevada who sits nearest me [Mr. STEWART] procured the insertion in the platform of this provision:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

That was in the closing part of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration. Everybody who has kept at all in touch with the history of this country well understands that Mr. Cleveland's principal object in financial affairs was to put this country on a gold basis. I know that there was some pretense even then with Mr. Cleveland and his party that they wanted to put this country on a gold basis that they might eventually get to the bimetallic standard; and that is about the proposition advanced by the Senator from Rhode Island in the speech made by him the other day. He is not quite willing to admit that he has given up the idea of the bimetallic system, but he hopes to get it through the adoption of the gold standard first.

In 1892, when Mr. Harrison was renominated for the Presidency, this is what the Republican party declared:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallicism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

When Mr. Harrison wrote his letter of acceptance September 3, 1892, he said:

The resolution of the convention in favor of bimetallicism declares, I think, the true and necessary condition of a movement that has upon these lines my cordial adherence and support. I am thoroughly convinced that the free coinage of silver at such a ratio to gold as will maintain the equality in their commercial uses of the two coined dollars would conduce to the prosperity of all the great producing and commercial nations of the world. * * *

With that declaration Mr. Harrison received the support, in the State of Colorado, of very many Republicans who had doubted his fidelity, perhaps, to the bimetallic system. In fact, there has never yet been a Republican President until the present Executive who has declared in favor of the single gold standard. Every one of them has been a bimetallicist since I have been in public life.

I have a quotation from Mr. Garfield's inaugural address:

By the experience of commercial nations in all ages it has been found that gold and silver afford the only safe foundation for a monetary system.

I suppose nobody will dispute that the Republican party up to 1896 asserted itself as a bimetallic party. I do not suppose that anybody who has read this bill will contend that it is now a bimetallic party, and especially when it is known that the party has surrendered to the Indianapolis junta. The President of the United States surrendered to that concern in 1897. I will have occasion later to refer to the message he sent here, in which he recommended for our consideration the action of this intelligent convention, which, he said, had given "two whole days" to this great question and had concluded that gold was the only safe standard.

The campaign of 1896 was not made by the Republican party on a gold-standard basis. I speak whereof I know. I made speeches in ten States of the Union, and I alleged everywhere I went that that was not an honest declaration which said we will maintain the gold standard in this country until the principal commercial nations shall agree to an international arrangement, which we promise to promote. Everywhere I went I was challenged. It was said that I was slandering the Republican party; that the Republican party was a bimetallic party; that the only way to get bimetallicism was through international agreement.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.

I wish to say a word on the question of international agreement. I have repeatedly said in the Senate that if we could secure an international agreement, it was the most desirable thing in the world to do. I am one of those who recognize the fact that if we can maintain bimetallicism alone, all the world can maintain it better by acting in accord, and so, from time to time, I have favored and have done my part, I believe, to secure international bimetallicism through international conferences. I did not object to that provision in itself, but I did object to it because it seemed to me to be utterly inconsistent with the other provision—that the gold standard should be maintained.

If the gold standard was not the best standard, if the gold-standard system was one that we desired to get rid of, why should we not get rid of it? It was a declaration in the national platform of the lack of power on our part to control our own affairs. I said in the convention that it was the first time in the history of this country that the American people had declared their inability to take care of themselves. We fix our tariff as we choose. We frame our foreign-intercourse laws as we think they ought to be;

but when it comes to the question of finance, which touches the people more closely than any other, we abdicate our great power and turn it over, so far as metallic money is concerned, to foreign nations. When we shall have enacted this bill, which turns over to the banks of the country the balance of the money control in this country, we will be a people to be despised by all mankind.

There is a great deal of—I will not say ignorance, but perhaps I might use that word—there is a great deal of misrepresentation, at least, as to this question, growing out of ignorance or what is worse; and it is in this that we have found one trouble in dealing with it. We have had people stand before us ex cathedra, as if there was no questioning their statements, and tell us that we could not maintain the double standard, or silver and gold, in this country unless we had the assistance of somebody else. Then they have misrepresented history. They have declared over and over again that we could not point to any condition that existed anywhere where bimetalism has prevailed where there was not an alternating system of gold one year and silver the next.

GOLD AND SILVER IN HISTORY.

If I may refer to some other place, recently in debate it was declared that certain persons stood for gold, unchangeable gold, gold that was always a dollar. The man who makes that statement writes himself down as unacquainted with history, financial and otherwise.

Not long ago, in 1896, in the great city of Boston, a man who had sat in this Chamber, a man who had presided over the Treasury Department, who had twice been governor of his State, before as intelligent an audience as could be assembled in the United States, declared that gold has always been the standard of value—the standard, he said, amongst the highly civilized and amongst the savages alike, the only measure of value in the present and in the past. Those people had a right to believe that he was telling the truth. They had the right to suppose that his statements were based on historical facts. There was not a word of truth in the statement. History denies every assertion he made on this point. It can be shown by the most indisputable authority that for nearly eight hundred years practically no gold was coined in all Europe. It can be shown that when he was governor of Massachusetts the great majority of mankind was standing on the silver standard.

It could be shown from authorities not to be disputed or maligned that gold was but merchandise in Europe, outside of England and Portugal, until 1848. History declares that the English people never coined a dollar of gold until after the year 1800. Rogers, a great authority upon this question, in his Industrial and Commercial History of England, declares that no gold was coined in that country until 1826, and practically none until after the beginning of the seventeenth century. Gold was not the standard in England until 1816; it was practically not the standard, only by law, till 1821. The other day I looked over the testimony taken before the committee of Parliament in 1810—and if anybody wants to challenge the authority, I will bring it here and show it to him.

Before that committee it was stated repeatedly that gold was but an article of merchandise in Holland, in Germany, practically in all continental Europe; that the Bank of Hamburg had declined to loan money on gold bars, because the authorities said they would be called upon to pay silver, and they could not always get silver with gold. I do not mean to say that gold did not do money duty. It has done money duty more or less, in my judgment, since before any history records the transactions of men. I believe I can demonstrate that more than two thousand two hundred years before the Christian era it had a relation established by law in China, and it is indisputably proved that fifteen hundred years before the Christian era law had fixed the relation in India between gold and silver; but silver from that time to 1848 was the standard of the majority of mankind.

These are not unsustained assertions of mine; no man who is acquainted with the political and economic history of the world can deny them. They can be proved by all history. Gold was preferred, I will admit, in the Asiatic countries, not because it was money, but because it was an article of adornment and beauty. It was used as a valuable measure of exchange in the early history of the world, and yet silver has been the money of the great majority of the peoples.

And to-day the man who declares that gold is the standard of the world and measures the values of the world makes a statement that he can not support. To-day there are more men who look to silver as money to measure the relations of commodities to each other than there are who look to gold.

We are told often that gold is the money of the rich and respectable nations and that we must put ourselves in line; that we must get a relation to that metal because it is used by the wealthy people of the world. There is nothing in that. Up to 1871 the great commercial nations of the world were on the silver standard. Great Britain, as I said, went to the gold standard nominally in 1816; Portugal, I think, in 1854, if my memory is correct, but the date is immaterial. In 1870 there were two Christian nations of the world that had gold as their standard. One was Great Britain, and the other was Portugal, and there was no other nation, heathen or Christian, that had that standard.

Yet we are repeatedly told by public officials, and the people have been led to believe that it is true, that we are attempting to force upon the country a metal which has been discredited for all time, a money that is incapable of doing money duty, when, I repeat, the history of the world shows that silver has been the money of commerce; silver has been the money under which the human race has made its progress and its upheaval and uplifting, and not gold. It is the money of the masses, it is the money of mankind, and to-day, I repeat, it is the money of more than one-half the human race.

THE HOUSE BILL.

Mr. President, I had not intended to be very lengthy in some things which I wished to say to-day. There is another feature to this case which I shall present at some other time. I want to take up this bill, omitting some things that I should say; for I think if I were to attempt to go into all the points that present themselves, I would lengthen my remarks beyond what I desire. I shall avail myself of the privilege which fortunately we all have, and which I hope we shall maintain in this body, of freely expressing our sentiments when a bill is before the body. If free expression can be thwarted in committee or in caucus, when a measure comes here it can have the untrammelled consideration of the American Senate.

I want to deal with the House bill, and I mean to deal with it as rapidly as I can. I had thought I would take up one phase of the subject on which the public perhaps has been somewhat misinformed. Every little while you see in public prints a reference to "prophecies unrealized." It is stated that we predicted that immense disasters would come to this country from the gold standard and that those predictions have not been realized. On some other occasion I think I will consider that subject. I have some prophecies on the other side which have not been realized to which I desire to refer, but I will not do so this afternoon, because I am somewhat hoarse, and because I think if I attempted it I would go to greater length than I should.

I want to ask before I take up the bill—it seems to me it is a proper and pertinent inquiry—what is the demand for it? Whence does it come? Who is pressing it? Is the gold standard here now? Have we the gold standard? The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] would tell me we have. The Secretary of the Treasury declares we have. He is the mouthpiece of the President on all these questions. The gold-standard press declare we have it; but they are not all united on this question. For instance, the New York Sun, formerly a Democratic paper, but now a very strong Republican Administration paper, has repeatedly in its columns declared that there is no sense in the bill. Have the toilers and laborers of the country demanded this legislation, this renewed agitation that we hear so much about, which disturbs the business of the country? We have been told for many years, every time we introduced a bill touching the currency, that it had a tendency to disturb business affairs, and that we ought not to do it. Is it in accordance with the Republican platform of 1890? The Republicans simply said the gold standard should be maintained. That is a declaration that it is here.

Mr. President, there is more in this bill than the maintenance of the gold standard. The gold standard, if the Secretary of the Treasury is correct, does not need any further legislation. It is already fixed, and I know some people say it is fixed by Executive act. But if that is true, it is not here. The Executive has no right to fix the gold standard on this country. If it is here, it is here by virtue of law, or it is not here at all. But the party that asserts that it is here ought to give some excuse why it wants to reaffirm the fact. Why do you want to repeat it? Why do you want to say, as is said in the House bill, "that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold?" It is now the dollar. It has been a dollar of gold since 1873, but it did not make the gold standard. The first dollar that we ever had was a silver dollar. That did not make the silver standard.

Does anybody mean to say here in this Chamber that because Congress adopted the gold dollar as the unit it gave us the gold standard? If so, we must have had a silver standard from 1792 to 1873. We did not have. We had the bimetallic standard. We had a silver dollar that stood as the unit. The dollar was the unit. The dollar is the unit now, and it does not make any difference what it is made of. The silver dollar is not the unit. It is the dollar which is the unit of expression—a place to start from, to make the calculations from. The pound sterling for hundreds of years had no representative at all in coin. The pound sterling was the measure by which anything was calculated, and yet there was no such coin in England until modern times, since the gold standard was established, when the sovereign was created.

I do not care whether we have got the gold standard—and I am not now going to discuss it—but we have not got the gold standard as we will have it under this bill. We have about $500,000,000 of silver doing money duty, and doing it well and nobly. I hope to show, before we get through, that it will no longer be doing money duty as it is now doing, measuring values, the equal of gold, every dollar of the same value, every dollar equal to a gold dollar. What is the matter with the silver dollar now, that both the Senate bill and the House bill should provide that it shall be practically destroyed?

The silver dollar has bought from the day it was first coined in this country as much as any gold dollar ever bought, and part of the time it bought 3 per cent more. We prepared for the issue of silver dollars in 1875, under the direction of the Senator who sits before me [Mr. ALLISON]. We heard then in this Chamber that those would be cheap dollars. We heard a distinguished Senator from Vermont say to the Senate with great solemnity, "If you pass this bill, you will sell no more United States bonds except at a great discount. All your customs and revenues; internal and otherwise, will be paid in this depreciated money." We commenced coining these despised dollars when there was a difference of between 8 and 12 per cent between the greenback and the gold dollar, and I state what can not be denied now, that the first dollar which came out of the mint under that law was equal to any gold dollar in this land and that the Treasury Department began to exchange these dollars at once for gold.

And yet there was never a Secretary who did not tell us that we ought to stop coining silver for fear it would be cheap. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, on the 4th day of April (this act had passed on the 28th of February), stated before the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which Mr. Bruckner was at that time the chairman, that he was exchanging silver dollars for gold. The Senator from Missouri in 1893 called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to tell us how many of the silver dollars and silver certificates had been exchanged for gold, and he said he could not tell how much had been exchanged for gold between the passage of the bill and 1890, and so there he commences. Mr. Carlisle, in a communication that he made to this body while Secretary, stated that from 1879 up to that hour there had been frequent interchanges of silver for gold, not to redeem the silver, but that men who had gold had gone to the Treasury and put it in and taken out silver.

Let me read what Mr. Sherman said. I know the impression has gone out to many people that it has been difficult to keep silver on an equality with gold and that there has been an effort in that direction, and I have heard Senators say that it could not have been done but by the declaration of the act of 1893. That act, so far as that is concerned, had no influence whatever on this question.

Not a dollar of silver has ever yet been redeemed in gold. Mr. Sherman was asked by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio:

Do you expect to pay out the silver dollar coined by you for current expenses, or only for coin liabilities, or to hoard it for resumption?

Now, mind you, at that time, in the spring of 1878, we had not resumed specie payments, and there was still a divergence between the greenback and gold, but, I repeat, none between silver and gold. Let us see what Mr. Sherman said about it:

I expect to pay it out now only in exchange for gold coin or for silver bullion. I am perfectly free to answer the question fully, because on that point, after consulting with many members of both Houses, I have made up my mind what the law requires me to do. I propose to issue all the silver dollars that are demanded in exchange for gold coin. That has been going on to some extent; how far I can not tell. Then I propose to use the silver in payment for silver bullion, which I can do at par with gold. I then propose to buy all the rest of the silver bullion which I need under the law with silver coin.

Now, I state a fact that nobody will deny—if anyone does deny it, I will furnish the proof—that from that hour there has never been a time when there has been any difference between silver and gold except during the panic of 1893, when silver was sold in the city of New York for 3 per cent more than gold. Why, Mr. President? Simply because it was the most convenient money to use for the people who wanted to pay their workmen, not because they had any greater desire to use it.

I refer to the report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the call of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I will say to Senators if they want to see it, it is Executive Document No. 29, Fifty-third Congress, first session. This report shows that between September 18, 1880, and the last day of the year 1884 the exchanges of silver dollars for gold was $80,403,910. In 1880 the Treasury Department issued a circular saying that it would exchange if anybody brought his gold. I do not remember the exact terms; but they said if persons brought their gold to the Treasury, they could get silver dollars for it, and it is under that circular that this deposit was made.

In January, 1885, that circular was withdrawn; the public were denied the opportunity of carrying their gold to the Treasury and exchanging it for silver dollars. That year, 1885, is only credited with the amount that came in during the month of January, which is $575,090, but afterwards the exchange seems to have been resumed.

Mr. President, during that time the Treasury had plenty of gold to pay for the greenbacks, if anybody wanted them, and during that time, when the public were taking their gold and going to the Treasury Department and getting silver dollars, they could have taken their greenbacks and coin to the Treasury and got gold. During that whole time the total amount of greenbacks that went to the Treasury in exchange for gold was only $4,167,388.

Now, then, during the years 1887, when this exchange began, and in 1888 and 1889, the report No. 29, which I have referred to, shows that there were $11,457,842 of silver certificates exchanged for gold. Secretary Carlisle says:

For subsequent years—

that is, after 1889—

there is no data to determine the amount so exchanged

But he thinks not over $2,000,000 per annum.

He further says:

Silver dollars have been exchanged for gold or paper redeemable in gold from 1879 to the present time—

That was in 1893 when he was writing—but the amount of the various classes previous to 1887 can not be given.

When a man took gold to the Treasury and got a silver certificate, he got practically a silver dollar, for he got the paper that called for a silver dollar; but these are standard silver dollars. Between 1887 and 1889, inclusive, three years, the total amount of standard silver dollars so exchanged for gold was $29,021,280. The Secretary says "for subsequent years the data is not complete," but he thinks about the same as in the last three years, or about $9,673,763 per annum.

The Secretary then gives the total amount of silver certificates exchanged for gold at $100,436,842, and the total number of silver dollars exchanged for gold at $67,421,290, or a total of silver certificates and silver dollars exchanged for gold at $167,858,132.

Now, Mr. President, all this time every Secretary of the Treasury, acting under an influence that does not emanate in Washington, had been telling us that the silver dollar was not an honest dollar and had been predicting that it would fall in its value in a little while, and that its purchasing power then being equal to gold it could not be maintained. And yet the people who had $167,000,000 of gold went to the Treasury with it and turned it into the Treasury and said, "Let us have these cheap silver dollars." Why? They knew that the statement that they were cheap was false. They knew that as long as this great country needed money, with its immense commerce and its immense trade, there was no trouble but what the silver dollar would be the equal of the gold dollar as long as it was equal in debt-paying power.

PARITY.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Did the Treasury Department ever redeem a silver dollar or a silver certificate in gold?

Mr. TELLER. Never, not up to this time, Mr. President. That has never been done to this hour. Mr. Carlisle did say that if it were necessary to maintain the parity, he would do it, but there was no necessity to do it to maintain the parity.

People talk a good deal about maintaining the parity as if there was some great obligation of the Government to maintain the parity between these two kinds of metals. Now, the interchangeability between metals should be left to commerce. It is left there by every well-regulated government. You can not go to the Bank of France and take your silver there and get gold, nor can you take your gold there and get silver unless you make a merchandise affair of the exchange. If you carry your gold there and say you want silver, they will charge you for giving you silver; but if you carry the bank notes there, the bank officers will give you whichever they think you ought to have, and that depends upon which they have the most of and which they think they can spare the easiest.

Mr. President, in spite of the slander and misrepresentation that has been uttered from this Chamber and the other and from the officials, the parity of our silver dollars has been maintained because the country needed them as money, because they knew that they would perform the great function of interchange in this country in every commercial center, and because they knew more than that. We knew there was not a country on the face of the earth where civilized men live where it was not the equal of a gold dollar. I recall that one year Henry Clews & Co. issued a circular in which they said the value of the silver dollar in London is, well, I will say, 90 cents. I do not know what it was; it may have been 80 cents. I wrote a note to that distinguished house and said if they knew of any chance to buy silver dollars over there at that figure I would be very glad to have the entire lot; that I could find people who would take them. "Oh, well," they said, "they meant the price paid for the silver in a dollar and not the dollar itself."

Well, Mr. President, it may be that when that dollar gets over there it is no longer a dollar, but the man who holds it in his hands knows there is a place where it is a dollar. He knows that back in the United States anything that he wants he can buy with that dollar. Do you suppose he is going to be fool enough to carry it to a broker and sell it at a figure that practically reduces it to bullion? Not at all, Mr. President. I will admit that that would not be the condition if this country were a small, one-horse affair, if we did not have a great commerce, and all the world was not wanting to trade with us. In that case it could not be done; but I beg the Senate to understand that from my standpoint the American nation is a bigger nation than most of the nations of the world.

I have not lost sight of the fact myself that we have almost 80,000,000 people; I have not lost sight of the fact that our internal and external commerce beats that of any other 80,000,000 people on the face of the earth two to one; and we count in the world's affairs in commerce as if there were a population of 200,000,000 here. We are consumers and producers as no other people in the world are. The best authorities that I have seen, and I believe they are reliable, declare that American consumption is two and a half times greater per capita than that of the other most-favored nations of the world. It has been so, Mr. President, for all time almost since we have been a nation, and why? Because we have had a condition here under every Administration that ever existed better than they have had anywhere else in the world. We have had a great uncultivated continent; we have had wealth such as no other three and one-half million square miles have had. Here was the place where every man who wanted to labor could get compensation for his labor; here was the place for the man who would not labor and wanted to use his brains.

Oh, Mr. President, when people talk about waiting until the principal commercial nations of the earth agree that we may do this or that, I want to say to them the American people are big enough and great enough to do anything that their judgment tells them they ought to do, and they are righteous enough never to do that which would dishonor them or degrade them in the estimation of the decent elements of mankind.

If we should go to the use of silver and find it was not honest, we would back out. But we are not willing that the chairman of the Committee on Finance and his associates shall assume a condition and then say to us, as he said the other day, "You are not bimetalists; you are for the single silver standard." He did not include me, because he said the Democrats were of that stamp, but he might have included me, because he knew that on this question I am in accord with them. Now, sir, I do not believe that here or anywhere else the Senator will say that there is anything in my public life that leads him to believe I am not as sensitive of American honor as he or any other man, wherever he may live.

I may be mistaken as to what would be the result if we went to free coinage, but the history of the ages is with me. We have tried it. It has been tried by almost every country in the world. Every civilized land has tried it, and it has never failed.

Mr. President, at some other time I mean to take up this phase of the question, "Can a nation maintain silver and gold in its currency at the same time?" and I will prove to you and to the world that the repeated assertion made in this Chamber and elsewhere that we could not do it and that we did not do it is not true. We did it magnificently until the demand for silver was so great in Asia that they had there a ratio of 15 ounces of silver to 1 of gold, and they took away ours because it was more profitable to send it there than to keep it here.

I will prove that France, England, and the United States, all these countries, maintained the circulation of both coins of silver and gold, and that this repeated statement that you can not do it is not supported by history. There is not time to go into that question to-night. The next section of this bill reads:

SEC. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

Now, that provision takes all our bonds and our greenbacks. It takes every obligation that this Government has out, it does not make any difference what it is. All obligations are to be paid in gold. Of course I know that in the first section there is the following provision:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

This is absolutely contradictory; it is the exception, perhaps it may be said; but before I get through I shall attempt to show that there is a way and that it is the intent of this bill to make every obligation exchangeable for gold.

SEC. 3. That there be established in the Treasury Department, as a part of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, a division to be designated and known as the division of issue and redemption.

Then it provides what shall be transferred to it. I think, perhaps, as a matter of working affairs in the Treasury, the formation of a division and the reference to it of some things may be right. I have no complaint of that.

There shall be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and taken up on the books of said division as a redemption fund the amount of gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, the amount of United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates, the amount of silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates, the amount in silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890; and an amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount.

Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should like to suspend here and take this subject up to-morrow. I do not want to intrude upon anyone else, but there is one phase of this question that I intended to have taken up which I have omitted and to which I shall devote some time in the morning, perhaps, or perhaps I shall not take it up at all. If it is necessary for me to go on so as not to be in the way of some one else, I can continue; but I do not know that anyone cares to go on to-night or that anyone cares to go on to-morrow. If they do, I should not want to be in the way of anyone to-morrow, and I should prefer to go on now.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not advised that any reservations have been made for to-morrow on this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. No notice has been given, and I know of no other Senator who expects to speak on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I do not desire to delay anything, and I do not want to postpone my remarks until others who are not yet ready may be at all inconvenienced. But I have talked for some time to-day, and I am ready to suspend.

Mr. ALDRICH. So far as I know, there will be no objection at all to the Senator from Colorado going on at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. Of course I can go on now if it is at all desired.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know of no one on this side who wants to take the floor to-morrow. I think there will be no difficulty in the Senator from Colorado getting the floor to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will suspend until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 17, 1900.

CONSULS.

Martin J. Carter, of Pennsylvania, to be consul of the United States at St. Johns, Newfoundland.

Alexander Wood, of Pennsylvania, to be consul of the United States at Kehl, Germany.

George L. Darte, of Pennsylvania, now consul at Martinique, to be consul of the United States at Patras, Greece.

Alonzo C. Yates, of Virginia, now consul at Patras, to be consul of the United States at Martinique, West Indies.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

HOURS OF POLICEMEN, FIREMEN, AND OFFICERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. 3343) to regulate the service and fix the hours of service for persons employed as policemen, firemen, and officers in the District of Columbia, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont, under instructions of his committee, reports back the bill H. R. 3343 and asks that it shall be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill (H. R. 6627) making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin presents the following privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6627) making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will give notice later at what time I will call up the bill for consideration.

TWELFTH CENSUS.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night we were considering an appeal which had been taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] from the ruling of the Speaker on the bill that was presented as a privileged bill from the Committee on the Twelfth Census. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL], when I presented the bill yesterday as a privileged bill, raised the point against it that there was no provision in the rules of the House that made it a privileged matter, and contended that in view of that it must go upon the Calendar, the same as bills from other committees that are not privileged under the rules. The Speaker held it was a privileged bill, because it is carrying out a duty imposed on Congress by the Constitution, and hence, regardless of the question as to whether the rules specifically provided that it shall be privileged, that it is a matter of the highest privilege under the Constitution.

The gentleman from Connecticut, and in that position he was seconded by my honored friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], took the position that the rules must govern, and insisted that inasmuch as there was no specific rule that covers the case, the bill presented by the Committee on the Census therefore was not privileged. The Speaker, in making his decision yesterday, called the attention of the House to a ruling of Speaker Reed in the Fifty-first Congress, when Mr. Dunnell, of Minnesota, the then chairman of the Committee on the Census, presented a bill for apportionment, and it was contended then, as it is now, that that committee was not a privileged committee, and the bill itself was not a privileged bill; and Speaker Reed held in that instance it was privileged, and the House acquiesced in the ruling of the Speaker; and the present occupant of the chair, in rendering his decision, followed the precedent that was there established. Since the adjournment of the House my attention has been called to two other decisions of this House that cover this point, namely, that any matter that under the Constitution is a matter of high privilege can be brought into the House and considered regardless of the question whether the rules of the House make the proposition itself a privileged matter.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call to the attention of the members of the House the decision that was rendered by Mr. Speaker Randall in 1877:

On February 12, 1877, Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, from the Committee on the Privileges, Powers, and Duties of the House of Representatives in Counting the Vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. 4663) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect to vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President, and demanded the previous question thereon.

Mr. Horatio C. Burchard, of Illinois, made the point of order that the committee had no authority to report the said bill.

The Speaker overruled the point of order, on the ground that the resolution creating the said committee authorized it "to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States," and also gave the committee the right to report at any time. The Speaker further stated that he could not conceive of a question of higher constitutional and parliamentary privilege than was involved in the bill under consideration, and he therefore held the bill to be in order at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What section is that?

Mr. HOPKINS. I am reading from page 90 of the Compilation, section 143:

On January 10, 1843, Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, as a privileged subject, submitted the following:

"I do impeach John Tyler, Vice-President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors."

Then he cites the charges that he made.

Mr. Everett, of Vermont, submitted that the proposition of Mr. Botts could not take precedence on the ground of privilege, and therefore was not in order according to the routine of business as established by the rule. The Speaker decided that as by the Constitution it was a privilege of the House of Representatives to institute proceedings against the President, he considered that the present was a privileged proceeding and took precedence of other proceedings.

These two cases, in addition to the decision cited by the Speaker last night, namely, the decision of Speaker Reed in the Fifty-first Congress, in my judgment, establish beyond peradventure that it is not necessary, where the question is a constitutional question, that there should be a specific rule of the House to determine the privileged character of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague yield a moment to call attention to one other noted ruling? In 1875 or 1876—when Mr. Randall was Speaker of the House—the House was engaged in canvassing the vote of electors for the Presidency, and pending the coming together of the House and the Senate, under the lead, as I recollect, of my distinguished colleague, Mr. Springer, and others upon that side of the House, dilatory motions, which had always been held in order, were being made. It was one of the most memorable scenes I ever witnessed in this House. A point of order was made that they were not in order because the House was engaged in the performance of a duty directed by the Constitution. The gavel of Speaker Randall came down, and he sustained the point of order and disregarded the then rule of the House because the Constitution called for the performance of the duty.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, Article I, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States requires that Congress shall, every ten years, make an enumeration of the people of the United States as shall be directed by law. In the Fifty-first Congress a bill was prepared by the Census Committee and presented to the House, organizing the machinery for the purpose of taking this enumeration.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who so ably argued this position yesterday afternoon, is in entire harmony with the position of the Speaker when the bill is taken into consideration. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] stated in his remarks in opposition to the ruling of the Speaker as follows:

If there were an enumeration of the people for the purpose of apportioning the Representatives, the bill would be privileged.

Clearly showing that he recognizes the force and effect of the decision to which I have already adverted and the ruling of Speaker Reed in the Fifty-first Congress. Now, that brings us squarely to the question as to what is an enumeration. Is it simply a count of the people? Not at all. The Constitution says we must make an enumeration as provided by law. How do we do that? We do it by establishing a Census Bureau, by creating a Director of the Census, an assistant director, and a number of statisticians, a large clerical force, for the purpose of tabulating the facts collected. We create the offices of supervisor and enumerators and special agents and all this great force for what purpose? For the specific purpose of carrying out these provisions of the Constitution to which I have just referred.

Now, what is the other part of it? Why, Mr. Speaker, the printing of the tabulated facts collected for the benefit of Congress is just as much a part of the enumeration as it is to appoint a supervisor. The enumerators go out and gather the facts; but how can the enumerators act without having the printing done?

They take the instructions given to them prepared by the Director and his able corps of assistants. It requires tons of printing to do that, so that the clause in the law which relates to printing clearly comes within the provision of the Constitution just referred to. If I understood the gentleman from Texas correctly yesterday, he concedes that the bill that was presented in the Fifty-fifth Congress is in strict accordance with the Constitution and was a privileged matter. I now desire to have the Clerk read from the desk the bill that is proposed by the committee at this time, to show to the members of the House that it is in strict accordance with the provisions of the original bill; that it is simply to amend certain deficiencies that are found to exist in that law.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in addition to the power and authority conferred upon the Director of the Census by an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1890, said Director of the Census shall have power, and is hereby authorized, to appoint and employ, as the necessity therefor may arise, one purchasing agent, at an annual salary of $2,500; two chiefs of division, at an annual salary of $2,000 each; five clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3, and eight clerks of class 2; to employ such number of special agents, not exceeding 55 in all, as may be proper and necessary for the purposes of gathering any information or data in relation to or required by the agricultural schedules; to employ special agents to assist the supervisors in large cities whenever he may deem it proper, in connection with the work of preparation for, or during the progress of, the enumeration, or in connection with the reenumeration of any district, or a part thereof; to employ as special agents such of the supervisors of census as he may deem wise and proper, at the compensation provided for in section 17 of said act, the intent and purpose being that the supervisors of census may be appointed special agents at the time they are acting as supervisors, and receive the compensation to which they are entitled as supervisors and also as special agents. And the Director of the Census is authorized and directed to collect statistics relating to all of the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restrictions and limitations contained in section 8 of said act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses;" and the Director of the Census is hereby specifically authorized to pay such supervisors for their services as special agents the compensation which he may authorize out of any general or special appropriation which may be made for the payment of special agents, and to allow any supervisor of census, in addition to the contingencies provided for in section 11 of said act, actual and necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $5 per day during his necessary absence from his usual place of residence in connection with the work of preparation for the enumeration; to allow, in fixing the compensation of enumerators, not more than 5 cents for each death reported, to purchase any and all law books, books of reference, or periodicals which may be required from time to time in the Census Office, and pay for the same out of the sum appropriated by the said act of March 3, 1890, or any other appropriation hereafter made for the census work, whether there be a specific authorization for such purchases or not: Provided, That the aggregate amount of such purchases shall not exceed the sum of $2,000.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the other statistics required to be collected by section 7 of said act approved March 3, 1890, there shall be collected on the agricultural schedules information concerning the number and kinds of live stock not on farms; and the Director of the Census shall have power to pay the enumerators for collecting such information, in his discretion, not less than 5 nor more than 10 cents for each barn or inclosure visited in which such live stock may be found: Provided, however, That the Director of the Census may appoint special agents to gather the information required by this section whenever he may deem it proper.

SEC. 3. That in the event of the death of any supervisor or enumerator after his appointment and entrance on his duties, the Director of the Census be, and he is, authorized to pay to his widow, if there be one, and if not to his legal representative, such sum as may be just and fair for the services rendered by said supervisor or enumerator prior to his death.

SEC. 4. That the Director of the Census, whenever he shall find that there is a probability of delay in the printing or publishing of the census reports beyond the period required by the said act of March 3, 1890, be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to contract with any individual, copartnership, or corporation for the printing and binding, or either, of any of said reports, in the manner prescribed by law for the letting of public contracts.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, if the members of the House followed carefully the reading of the bill they will see that its sole and only object is to carry out this provision of the Constitution which imposes the duty upon this House and the Senate to provide the machinery for enumerating the people of this country, in order that an apportionment may be made as contemplated in the Constitution itself.

The first portion of the bill relates to increasing the power and efficiency of the clerical force in the office of the Director of the Census. The second relates to the appointment of special agents to aid the supervisors in laying out the enumeration districts, so that the enumeration may be made more efficiently and accurately than could be done under the original bill.

The third section relates to an increased power in taking the census of mutes, blind people, and other unfortunates.

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the adoption of section 4 in the amended bill, which relates to printing, this question that is now before the House would not have been raised at all. I desire, however, to say to gentlemen upon both sides of the Chamber that in sustaining the Speaker it commits no man to that section of the proposed bill. When that bill is considered upon its merits, those who stand with the majority of the committee can vote to sustain that section. Those who are opposed to it can vote against it, and whatever the action may be in that regard, it will be the action of the House and we must bow to the mandate of the House. But so far as this appeal is concerned, and the question that is now pending, it is as much a part of the enumeration as any branch of the bill that is already the law of the land, or as any part of the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] concede to be germane to the original bill and to be privileged matter.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, with the explanation I have made here today, there will be no hesitancy and no doubt among my Republican colleagues as to the correctness of the ruling of the Speaker. I trust that my Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber will feel that the decision of Speaker Reed and the decision of Speaker Randall are in harmony with the decision made by the present Speaker, and that the motion which I now make, Mr. Speaker, to lay this appeal on the table will be approved by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion until I have an opportunity to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I appeal to the gentleman that it is not fair to move to lay the appeal on the table after making a long speech himself.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] both discussed this matter at length yesterday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; but you have presented new matter—

Mr. HOPKINS. I must insist on my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You have presented new matter, and I submit that the motion to lay an appeal on the table is never made by a gentleman at the conclusion of a long speech in which he has presented new matter. Now, I want to comment upon that briefly—

Mr. HOPKINS. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to comment upon the new authorities to which you have referred, and to show that they do not apply. I appeal to the gentleman's sense of fairness—

Mr. HOPKINS. There has been more discussion on that side of the House than on this, and I must insist upon my motion.

Mr. GAINES. The bill was not read until this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois insists upon his motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have never known a motion of that kind to be made when new matter has been introduced. I have never known that to be done in all my experience here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will please suspend. The gentleman from Illinois insists upon his motion, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to submit it. The gentleman from Illinois moves to lay the pending appeal upon the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. MERCER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of laying the appeal on the table will, as their names are called, vote aye; those opposed, no; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 138, answered "present" 2, not voting 49; as follows:

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. McALEER.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the Clerk to read that I was paired with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]? I would like to know how the gentleman voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is paired, but the gentleman from Virginia voted.

Mr. HULL. Then I want my vote to stand.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POLK]. I desire to withdraw my vote, and to be recorded "present."

Mr. ADAMS. Did the Clerk announce my name as paired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. ADAMS. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. McALEER].

The SPEAKER. Neither voted.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether Mr. RYAN voted?

The SPEAKER. Both Mr. RYANS voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the appeal was laid on the table was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2284. An act extending the time for the completion of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by an act approved June 3, 1896;

S. 2336. An act repealing section 4716 of the Revised Statutes so far as the same may be applicable to the claims of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain; and Senate concurrent resolution No. 9:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document 278, second session Fifty-third Congress, the same being a "Digest of decisions and precedents of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, relating to their powers and privileges respecting their members and officers, and to investigations, contempts, libels, contumacious witnesses, expulsions, etc.," as revised and new matter added, together with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a Senate bill and resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2336. An act repealing section 4716 of the Revised Statutes so far as the same may be applicable to the claims of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain—to the Committee on Pensions.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 9:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document 278, second session Fifty-third Congress, the same being a "Digest of decisions and precedents of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, relating to their powers and privileges respecting their members and officers, and to investigations, contumacious witnesses, expulsions, etc.," as revised and new matter added, together with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 6237. By order of the House general debate was closed at 5 o'clock last evening. The Clerk will report the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1900, and for prior years, and for other objects hereinafter stated, namely:

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words in regard to a resolution I introduced on the 12th day of this month for the appointment of a special committee of nine to make a rigid and thorough investigation of the transactions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasury Department with the Standard Oil Trust bank, namely, the National City Bank, and the Hanover National Bank, of New York, and other national banks, from the 4th day of March, 1897, down to the present time.

Thus far I am informed no action has been taken by the partisan Committee on Rules in regard to that resolution. If I am reliably informed, from what I read in the newspapers I understand MARK HANNA, the great boss of the Republican party, has said this investigation of the charges against the Secretary of the Treasury is "all rot;" and that the President—the mere agent of the money trust—has given orders to suppress the investigation; and that the Republicans in this House intend to do nothing further in regard to these grave and serious charges, involving, as they do, the Administration with the Standard Oil Trust and its agents.

If that is so we want to know it, and we ought to know it. If you intend to smother this investigation, say so honestly and let the people know it. If you do not intend to take cognizance of these scandalous charges against the Secretary of the Treasury and his administration of the Treasury Department, we on this side of the House want to know it and ought to know it. And if you say that you intend to suppress all further investigation in regard to this matter we will see what we can do about it.

If you suppress that resolution for a thorough and rigid investigation I believe you will regret it. I know you have the physical power and the votes in this House to suppress this investigation; but if you do there is another remedy we can pursue, and for one I unhesitatingly say that you shall not escape responsibility and that, if necessary, the severer remedy will be resorted to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for a moment, and the committee will be in order. Gentlemen will please be seated.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to read the resolution for an investigation introduced by me on the 12th day of January, 1900. It is as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee, consisting of nine members of the House of Representatives, be immediately appointed by the Speaker to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any other national bank of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1897, to the present time, and especially in regard to all letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States, or any person connected therewith, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any person acting for them, or either of them, since the 4th day of March, 1897, relating to the depositing of public funds, bonds, or revenues in said bank or banks or any other relations or business transactions now existing or heretofore had between the Government and the said banks, or either of them, and the amount of public money, bonds, or revenue deposited with said banks, or either of them, or with any national bank, by the Government, upon what security, for what length of time, and the reasons therefor, and whether said banks, or any of them, have paid the Government any interest on said deposits, and if so, how much, and all other information concerning the same or in any way relating thereto; and also the date of the sale of the custom-house property of the United States in New York City to said National City Bank, the date of the execution of the deed thereto, the date and manner of payment of the purchase money therefor, the disposition of the proceeds of said sale, and whether or not the Government has paid any rents for said property, or any portion thereof, for any purpose since the day of sale, and if so, to whom, and all facts relating to said transaction, and all other matters in connection therewith or in any way relating thereto; and said committee is authorized to send for persons, books, letters, telegrams, papers, documents, and agreements, administer oaths, and hold open sessions, and sit at any time in any place in the city of Washington, New York or Chicago, the expense for the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some one acting for him, shall attend said committee and carry out its mandates; and said committee is instructed to make a report to the House of Representatives, with testimony and exhibits, with all convenient speed.

This resolution speaks for itself, and expresses the scope of the investigation we demand. We insist that you take action in regard to it in the interest of truth and publicity.

Mr. Chairman, let me say here that I disclaim any personal animosity toward the Secretary of the Treasury, or any desire to seek partisan advantage or to make political capital for myself or my party out of this investigation. I believe, however, that the action of the Secretary of the Treasury is subject to severe criticism and open to grave public censure and condemnation. The charges against the Secretary of the Treasury can not be hushed up and they will not down. Make no mistake about that.

The Treasury Department, it seems, is no longer the safe of the Republic. It is a mere agency of the national banks, and responsive to their will and pliable to their manipulations. It seems that the Standard Oil trust owns, controls, and dominates this Administration. Read the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of inquiry of this House and no fair-minded man can doubt it for a moment.

We want the facts; we want to get at the truth; we want to unearth all the transactions between the Treasury Department and the Standard Oil trust. We want a searching, rigid, and thorough investigation; and if we get it, we believe that the facts will show a much worse condition of public affairs in the Treasury Department than anyone imagines.

Mr. Chairman, the charge is made and not denied that the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law knowingly and intentionally to carry out apparently an infamous political bargain.

The charge is made and not denied that the Secretary of the Treasury has practically turned the Treasury funds of the Government over to the Standard Oil trust and its bank, the most gigantic and cold-blooded monopoly the world has ever seen, and has permitted it and its agents to rob and swindle the people. You can not cover up this scandal.

In the first place, the charge is made by reputable newspapers and by reputable citizens that the Secretary of the Treasury clearly and distinctly violated the law in regard to the sale of the custom-house in the city of New York and in regard to the disposition of the proceeds of that sale. On the 2d day of March, 1899, this House passed an act for the sale of the custom-house property in the city of New York.

By section 4 of that act it was specifically enjoined on the Secretary of the Treasury that the proceeds of the sale should be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. That is the law, and the fact is, according to the admission of the Secretary himself, that he deliberately violated the law by leaving the proceeds of the sale in the Standard Oil national bank. Let us look at the matter for just a moment. The Secretary sold the custom-house property in New York City to the National City Bank, owned and controlled by the Standard Oil people. The sale was made on the 3d day of last July, and not one dollar of the money has ever found its way into the Treasury, but has remained all the time in the National City Bank.

This was a clear violation of the law, and if I can read the statute right it makes the Secretary of the Treasury guilty of embezzlement. Section 5490 of the Revised Statutes plainly says that every officer charged by an act of Congress with the performance of a duty who does what the Secretary of the Treasury did in this instance is guilty of embezzlement. That is the law, and the facts applicable to it are conceded. There can be no question about the liability of the Secretary.

Now, I say that you can not afford to ignore this grave and serious matter; you can not afford to suppress this investigation, and if you do the responsibility will be on you, and you will hear more about it before many weeks come and go. This scandal must be probed to the bottom, in the interest of truth and publicity, and I undertake to say that the more you try to cover it up, the more you will hear about it between now and the next election.

Section 4 of the act of March 2, 1899, being the act for the sale of the custom-house in New York City, says:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after the payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

And section 5490 of the Revised Statutes of the United States says:

Every officer or other person charged by any act of Congress with the safe-keeping of public money who fails to fully keep the same without loaning, using, or converting the same to his own use, or depositing in bank, is guilty of embezzlement.

The facts of the case are clear and admitted. The law speaks for itself, and is capable of only one construction.

If the Secretary of the Treasury is innocent, he should welcome and demand an investigation to clear himself. If he is guilty, he should be impeached and removed from office. The more you try to cover up this matter the worse it will be.

That, sir, is the law and the duty enjoined on the Secretary of the Treasury; and to-day, according to his own answer to the resolution of inquiry of this House, he admits that he has violated that law. He did not deposit the proceeds of that sale in the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. Let us see what he did. On the 3d of last July he sold the custom-house property. He sold it to the bank of the Standard Oil trust—the National City Bank—and instead of depositing the money in the Treasury he left it in the bank. Not one dollar ever passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, while I do not think the gentleman's remarks are upon the bill, yet I hope the five minutes will be given to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. I thank the gentleman from Illinois, but let me say to him that if his party does not probe to the bottom this great national scandal involving the Administration with the Standard Oil trust—the greatest monopoly in all the world—he will hear a good deal more about it on the stump between now and election day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury did not deposit one dollar of the proceeds of the sale in the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary, he left every dollar of the purchase price of this property with the purchaser, the National City Bank—that is to say, the Standard Oil bank—and it has been there from the day of its purchase down to the present time. Under the law of this country, in my judgment and in the judgment of other good and sound lawyers, this failure on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to obey the statute, his failure to deposit the money in the Treasury Department, constitutes embezzlement.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the country very briefly to a speech made by William McKinley, member of Congress from the State of Ohio, on the floor of this House on February 29, 1888. At that time he was charging a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury with political favoritism in depositing Government funds in pet national banks. The amount on deposit at that time with national banks was about $59,000,000, and this is what Mr. McKinley said:

That surplus money ought to be in the Treasury to-day. It is now out among the banks and held by them, they giving to the Government bonds as security for the deposit and are getting the money without interest. I charge the President of the United States and his Administration with being responsible for this condition of affairs and for whatever congested condition we have in the Treasury and whatever alarm prevails about the finances of the country. Every dollar of this money should be paid to redeem the Government debt.

What a difference between now and then! What a spectacle the record presents between William McKinley, the fearless representative of the people from the State of Ohio in 1888, and William McKinley, President of the United States in 1900, the mere agent of the Standard Oil trust, the most dangerous monopoly in all the land, and the greatest menace to-day to the stability of our finances and our free institutions. To-day there are over a hundred millions of dollars of the people's money deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury with pet national banks and not drawing a penny interest so far as the people are concerned.

The national banks, it is true, deposit with the Government bonds to secure these loans, but the national banks continue to draw interest on the bonds, and at the same time they loan out the people's money to the people and charge them on call loans in Wall street and other places interest from 6 to 186 per cent.

The national banks are oppressing the people and robbing them going and coming. The national banks are making hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars every year through the instrumentality of the Secretary of the Treasury. This outrage should be thoroughly investigated and remedial legislation speedily enacted. This is a most important matter and can not be ignored.

The answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of inquiry of this House is a most remarkable document, and to me it seems to be a humiliating confession of dereliction of duty. Every citizen in the country should read the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury. It presents a sad condition of public affairs that should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest and patriotic citizen.

His whole conduct in this matter from the beginning to the end is indefensible, suspicious, and reprehensible. No honest man can justify it or condone it. It demands the most searching and rigid investigation, and if the Secretary is the man his friends say he is he will insist, in justice to himself and to his reputation, on this investigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SULZER. I ask for five minutes more; I could not get time yesterday.

Mr. CANNON. I do not see any prospect of this ceasing, but I hope my friend can have five minutes more.

Mr. SULZER. Give me five minutes more and I will try to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. CANNON. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. SULZER. Now, sir, under the law, I doubt if the National City Bank could buy the custom-house property. It is very questionable if it could under its charter. But be that as it may, it has held title to the property and held the purchase money of the people, not paid a cent of interest on it, charged the Government rent for the use of the building, and escaped the payment of taxes to the city and State of New York.

Mr. Chairman, let me read you an extract from a letter written to the Secretary of the Treasury by A. B. Hepburn, the vice-president of the Standard Oil bank, as long ago as June, 1897. It begins very familiarly:

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: * * * We would like to remain a United States depository. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass of last year.

A. B. HEPBURN.

Now, we want an investigation to find out who the directors of the Standard Oil bank are and what they did in the campaign of 1896 that they have very great political claims on the present Republican Administration.

I undertake to say that a fair and full investigation of the Treasury Department will expose the most deplorable condition of affairs ever known in the history of this country. Read the answer of the Secretary and refuse this investigation if you dare.

In that answer he practically confesses and admits the charges made against him. Let me read you another letter, written by James Stillman, the president of the National City Bank, and a relative, I am informed, of John D. Rockefeller. This letter is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.

New York, November 12, 1897.

DEAR SIR: Again referring to your letter of November 10, in which you advise us that a deposit will be made with this bank on the 22d instant of $13,645,250, and also advise us that we will be directed, by the usual transfer order, to deposit with other designated depositories a part of this fund, in proportion to the securities they have lodged with the United States Treasurer for the purpose of qualifying themselves, permit me to say that, not knowing the extent to which other banks have deposited bonds for the sake of qualifying themselves as depositories, we are unable to estimate the proportion of such funds that will remain with us and therefore be subject to our use in current business.

We would esteem it a very great favor, therefore, if you can advise us approximately what percentage of the $13,645,250 will remain with this bank. You, as a banker, can appreciate our desire to possess this information.

Yours, very respectfully,

JAS. STILLMAN, President.

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE.

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Yes, indeed, he seems to have appreciated it, and his connection with it is one of the most discreditable things that has happened in the administration of public affairs in this country since the Belknap scandal and the whisky frauds. Mr. Gage, I am informed, is a national banker and is very familiar with the schemes of national banks to make money by taking advantage of the unsuspecting public. I am informed that Mr. Gage admits that he is still connected with national banks and owns stock in one.

There is a law on the statute books which prevents a man engaged in the importation business from acting as Secretary of the Treasury, and there ought to be a law that a man engaged in the banking business and owning stock in a national bank should not be eligible to act as the Secretary of the Treasury.

If I had the time, I could read from the letters sent to us by Mr. Gage many of a very suspicious character. The answer of the Secretary demands action by this House, and immediate action.

This matter will not down. The people are thoroughly aroused. They demand the right to know the entire truth, and they will insist on that demand until it is granted. The Standard Oil trust must not control the Treasury of the people, and no agent of the Rockefellers must be the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Gage's answer is very unsatisfactory, and the investigation must follow as a matter of right. If it does not, harsher measures looking to his impeachment will be instituted by honest and fearless representatives of the people. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIBLEY. I regret exceedingly to be compelled to take a contrary view from my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. SULZER], whom I supported with great loyalty and zeal for the Democratic leadership of this House. I regret to differ with my friend, who is my choice for the second place on the Democratic ticket this year. Nevertheless, I must differ, and I will state briefly some of my reasons.

The New York World telegraphed me as follows:

NEW YORK, December 26, 1899.

HON. JOSEPH C. SIBLEY, Franklin, Pa.:

The action of the Administration in making the National City Bank of Wall street, which is a Standard Oil concern, the center to which must flow all internal-revenue receipts is plainly a move toward monopoly and centralization. Kindly wire at World's expense your opinion of the move. Will you introduce a resolution to investigate? If so, please wire your draft or an outline of it, that we may print.

THE WORLD.

To which I replied:

The WORLD, New York:

Confronted with financial emergency, Secretary of Treasury has acted with promptness and prudence along legal lines. In my opinion the American Congress will always uphold the Administration authorities in protecting by legal methods our commercial and industrial prosperity from threatened disaster.

JOSEPH C. SIBLEY.

That was my individual opinion then, and I have not changed that opinion to this hour. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have read the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury, and as a fair-minded man I accept it as a full, free, and frank statement of the conditions that justified him in each and all of these transactions. There was a conflagration existing in the city of New York, and a conflagration is easier stopped at the beginning than after it has met with the full sweep of the storm of adversity.

I glory in the fact that he had the courage and the will to check that conflagration at its inception, and that the panic which was then prevailing in the city of New York, when, as my friend [Mr. SULZER] says, money loaned up to 186 per cent, did not extend to all of the cities of this Union, north, south, east, and west. I would rather see business prosperity than partisan success [applause on the Republican side], and any triumph which must come to us as a party through the distress and suffering of the commercial, financial, and industrial interests of this country will come to us rather as a curse than as a help upon our onward way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They have criticised the Secretary of the Treasury because he did not send money to Chicago and New Orleans and all the other cities of the nation. Why, you might as well criticise the chief of the fire department of the city of Washington, if the Treasury is on fire, because he does not send half the engines over to the navy-yard or some other portion of the city. He directed the water upon the place where the fire was kindling and he stopped the conflagration, and to-day money is loaning in New York at from 8 to 6 per cent, and the industrial enterprises of this nation are moving forward and employing labor, and labor is receiving its fair meed of reward, or if it is not it should do so, for it has the opportunity so to do.

I for one, voicing only my individual opinion, want to say with emphasis that I am glad, that I rejoice in the action of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for those acts for which he has been criticised on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To my mind he is entitled to receive from all who love the prosperity of their country, whose representatives we are, rather a vote of commendation than of condemnation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the character or action of the Secretary of the Treasury. The answer that he made to the resolutions which were originally introduced carried conviction to the mind of every fair-minded man in this country that the Secretary of the Treasury was justified in all that he has done, that he not only stood personally vindicated at the end of the controversy, but had fully vindicated the conduct of the Administration in that behalf.

But I desire to refer to some complaints, or criticisms I might possibly term them, made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] against the Committee on Rules, because it had not made a report upon the resolutions which he has seen fit to introduce. It is fair that the Committee on Rules should be heard now upon this question briefly. The Committee on Rules is not a political machine, and the membership of this House has a right to have a fair and impartial action by that committee upon every resolution and matter that comes before it.

As I have already said—and I predicate my entire remarks upon the fact that I have alleged—the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury was a complete answer to all that had been alleged and was received with entire satisfaction, in my judgment, by the intelligent thinking men of the whole country.

Following that came another resolution, in substance a rehash of the same question. It may not be in the same language, but the purport and direction of the blow was for the same general purpose.

Now, shall the House hold that it is the duty of the Committee on Rules to put into motion an investigation every time that a member of this House sees fit to introduce a resolution for that purpose?

I am authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Rules to say that since the introduction of that resolution by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] no man has come to the Committee on Rules and asked to be heard in furtherance of the purpose manifested therein.

No man has come to the Committee on Rules and said, "This is the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury, but there is some of it that is not true; some of it is evasive; some of it is not fair." Nobody has said that. Shall the Committee on Rules be censured because they have seen fit thus far to put an end to a repetition of this character? Why, gentlemen, there is not a place in the United States where you would put the humblest, the poorest, the most degraded citizen upon trial on the mere allegation of somebody that he had done something wrong. Let somebody come to the Committee on Rules and state that within his personal knowledge something here is not truthfully stated—not come and make general statements—and there will be no difficulty about a report from that committee instantly.

But while all the facts are disclosed, what is the opportunity of the House. Gentlemen may criticise this answer. They may say that there ought to be some action taken because of some of the admitted facts; but until those facts are disputed by somebody, what good to put the House of Representatives to the expense, from its contingent fund, of another investigation? The Committee on Rules should at least have as much information as an ordinary grand jury or prosecutor would have before the filing of an indictment or an information, and certainly that ought to be so after a full and complete report such as this one that we have here now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I remember a great day in this House, when my friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. SIBLEY, did not have to go to the other side of the big aisle for his applause. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is not a man in this body for whom I have more personal affection than I entertain for him. But his present position has put me in an extremely awkward attitude, for two reasons: In the first place, the newspaper men have discovered a fanciful physical resemblance between him and me, so much so that we are frequently mistaken for each other.

Mr. SIBLEY. Let me interrupt you to say that a gentleman just now, who was looking for Mr. CLARK of Missouri, came up and addressed me as Mr. CLARK.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, that is precisely the trouble about it. I should hate exceedingly to have the present speeches of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] orated around over the country as mine. [Laughter.] But the chief difficulty about it is that in writing occasionally for the newspapers I devoted three whole columns not very long ago, before I knew of his change of base, to urging him as the Democratic nominee for Vice-President of the United States [laughter]; and while I do not withdraw my personal affection, I wish in this distinguished presence to withdraw that nomination and confer it on my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. SULZER], who is faithful to the cause at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I honor Mr. SULZER for his courage and his fidelity exhibited amid environments which would discourage, dishearten, and appeal a more timid man. His example is well worthy of imitation by Democrats everywhere.

In the Fifty-third Congress my friend from Pennsylvania occupied a position of exceeding glory. He was more exploited by Democratic newspapers than any other member of that body. I think nothing more splendid was ever uttered in this House than the first speech that my brother from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] delivered here, in which he stated, if I mistake not, that he had been ostracized by the plutocrats of the East in his social relations and cut in his business relations because, as a matter of conscience, of reason, of patriotism, and of humanity he was in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1. We hailed him as a hero and a martyr, because he was the only Congressman north of the Potomac River and east of the Allegheny Mountains who in the Fifty-third Congress stood faithful under all circumstances to the kind of Democracy that we preach in the Mississippi Valley. Even the Presidency itself was not beyond his reach that day. Members crowded about him—Democrats to applaud, Republicans to admire, and the Cleveland cuckoos to deride. That historic scene of which my friend was the central figure was worthy to be placed on immortal canvas by the pencil of a master artist.

Now all the applause that he can get is from the rank and historic enemies of the Democratic party, and my honest opinion is, without intending to be disrespectful or unkind, that his place in this House, and the place of those who entertain similar opinions, is on the other side of the big aisle. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Individually, I believe in the principles of the Democratic party as a matter of conscience, and I would rather fight ten Republicans in the open than fight one man masquerading in Democratic uniform and preaching Republican doctrines. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A man has a right to be a Republican, if he can reconcile it with his conscience and love of country; I have no quarrel with him; but he should frankly avow himself a Republican and not place the burden of his sins on Democratic shoulders by improperly calling himself a Democrat.

LYMAN J. GAGE AND HEPBURN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words about this bill. On the 5th day of June, 1897, Mr. A. B. Hepburn, vice-president of the National City Bank of New York, wrote a letter to Hon. Lyman J. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, which I undertake to say, if unrebuked, is a disgrace to every American citizen Democrat or Republican. It is the grossest piece of effrontery in our vernacular. I will quote you part of that letter:

We should like to remain a United States depository as at present.

That is a laudable desire.

Of course the bank is very strong.

That is a good reason why it should be a depository. I wish to ask, if you gentlemen here have any conscience left, any reason, any decency, or any love for the principles underlying this splendid Republic, the last hope of constitutional government on the face of the earth, how you like this sentence from that letter?

If you will take the pains—

Says Mr. Hepburn—

to look at the list of directors, you will see we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the campaign last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I put this question and press it home upon your minds and consciences: Is there a man in this House, on either side of the Chamber, who can conceive it to have been possible that in the days of Alexander Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, and Salmon P. Chase any man within the broad confines of this Republic would have had the gall to address such a letter as that to any one of those illustrious statesmen? Do you believe it? I do not. Of course Lyman J. Gage could not keep Hepburn from writing this letter; but he could have rebuked him for writing the letter, and it was his duty as an American citizen and chief financial officer of this Government to have rebuked him; but Mr. Gage seems to have thought the letter right and proper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And he did not have to do what was asked him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; he did not have to do it, but he did do it, nevertheless.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you will give me five minutes, you can ask me all the questions you want.

Mr. LACEY. It would take longer than that to answer this. What did Andrew Jackson do as to the distribution of the deposits?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Andrew Jackson took the deposits of the United States Government away from a lot of corruptionists just such as this man Hepburn [loud applause on the Democratic side] and put them in the hands of honest men. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He put them in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LACEY. He put them in some pet State banks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He put them in the Treasury of the United States, and that is the beginning of the Treasury system we have to-day. Now, if you want to ask another question, crack in. I would be glad for you to do so.

Mr. LACEY. You have not answered that fully. Did not he put those deposits with a lot of pet State banks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care anything about pet State banks or anything of the kind. Did Mr. Gage rebuke Mr. Hepburn? Nothing of the sort. Instead of rebuking Hepburn, he did the specific thing that Hepburn wanted him to do and conferred upon that bank the greatest favor that was ever conferred by any Government officer upon any bank since banks were instituted among men. Hepburn demanded this largess from Mr. Gage because he contributed boodle in 1896!

Now, I submit, if Mr. Hepburn had great claims on account of what they did for President McKinley in the campaign of 1896 by reason of the comparatively small favors that Lyman had conferred upon that bank prior to this last stupendous deal, then it will take a lightning calculator to estimate the amount of boodle which that bank will contribute to the Republican campaign in 1900 by reason of the colossal favors conferred by Mr. Gage recently. The plan seems to be between this bank and Mr. Gage, "You tickle me and I will tickle you" [laughter], because with $300,000,000 of deposits at 6 per cent the bank will rake in $18,000,000 per annum, and it can afford to give several millions to the Republican campaign fund this year.

Not only that; this bank is part and parcel of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, and perhaps Lyman J. Gage knows where to go and get some more boodle when it is needed. I undertake to say this, Mr. Chairman, that this letter of Mr. Hepburn will be the most widely circulated letter ever penned since pens were first invented—discounting in that respect all the letters written by soldiers, statesmen, authors, travelers, and philosophers for the delight and instruction of mankind. Hepburn did not know exactly what he was doing when he wrote that letter, except that he was getting the swag. [Laughter.] I will tell you what else he has done. He has "damned himself to everlasting fame;" and while he was doing it he has also "damned Lyman J. Gage to everlasting fame."

EXAMPLE OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not abuse people because they differ with me politically. I will cite you a case of a man that I never was enamored of, to show what he did on a certain occasion, and which proves how jealous the old patriots were of their reputation. According to all the historians John Quincy Adams in a great many respects was one of the most disagreeable men, personally, that ever sat in the White House, always excepting the one immediately preceding William McKinley. [Laughter.] But John Quincy Adams was a patriot. He was clean. He was exceedingly careful of his reputation. He was above suspicion. When he was elected Senator of the United States he happened to own a small block of stock in the old United States Bank, of which Nick Biddle was president. So sensitive was John Quincy Adams as to his good name that before he would take his seat as Senator, believing that legislation might be required touching the interests of the bank, that he went and sold that stock, an example which I commend to the statesmen of all parties on both sides of this Chamber. Evidently Lyman J. Gage is not a close blood relation of John Quincy Adams. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to my complimentary friend from Missouri. Of course, being publicly notified that I am out of the Vice-Presidential race would have been somewhat humiliating had I not in my remarks voluntarily withdrawn in favor of my friend from New York. [Laughter.] But when my good friend speaks so kindly of my attitude in the past and reprovingly of my position in the present, permit me to tell him I claim equal honesty for both positions.

I believed then that bimetalism was sacred, that it rose above the dignity of a mere party measure; but events over which no political party has control have so changed conditions that we produced last year more gold alone than was added to the whole world's stock of money, more than has been added in both gold and silver since the history of man was first written. Responsive to that increase, the world's price level has risen. I believe a cause may be sacred in one hour and ridiculous at a later period.

I believe that if we elect a Democratic President in the year 1900, that man's term will begin and expire without the possibility of writing one line in the Federal statutes of this nation contrary to the will of the Republican majority insured for six years in the United States Senate. I am not fighting because I love to fight, but desire, so far as lies in my power, to do something practical and something helpful. When my friend commends me to take my seat on the other side of the Chamber, located here as pleasantly as I am, with good friends and neighbors who overlook my idiosyncrasies, I do not know as I shall accept that invitation; but, Mr. Chairman, if I do, I shall not feel altogether out of place.

Sir, sitting over here, as we do, upon the eastern side of the Chamber, I have thought there possibly might be a very great party advantage accruing to us if the Democrats could change sides, that we might thus be able to catch the morning sun shining in our faces; but sitting over here it shines on our backs until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and we rarely catch its beams until about the time it is setting. [Applause on the Republican side.]

My opinion is that if the Democratic party is going to achieve success, or deserve it, we must have a policy of our own. We must show something in the line of constructive statesmanship. [Applause on the Republican side.] Announce your Democratic policy, promulgate your measures, and if they commend themselves to my reason, and in their tendencies make for the uplifting of our country and our common humanity, I will keep step as near as possible with those who march in the front ranks. But if you invite me to a banquet of carping, criticising, and fault-finding, you will excuse me if I do not go along, but as politely as possible decline your invitation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, there is rather a serious phase to this subject that I want to call attention to. The gentleman who began this debate saw fit to indulge in a grave, serious charge against one of the most prominent officers of this Government. I know that sometimes thoughtless people do not pay as much attention to the utterances of that gentleman as perhaps they ought. They are apt not to regard it, but when in his Representative capacity on the floor of this House he makes the grave charge that the Secretary of the Treasury has admitted that he has violated the statutes and thereby has committed a crime, that charge ought to receive some rebuke. He makes that statement, sir, in the presence of a full and complete statement by the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by every scrap of correspondence upon this whole subject. The gentleman makes that statement simply because of a possible difference between him and others as to the construction of the statutes and the authority of the officer to act under that statute. He reads from a recent enactment requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit a fund in the Treasury.

The Secretary, who, he says, admitted that he violated the law, specifically says that he has done what that act directed. And he is supported in that statement, and he gives all the facts and details of what he has done, by two decisions of the Supreme Court, by the opinion of the Attorney-General, by the opinion of the Comptroller of the Currency, and by the opinions of two of the most competent officers in the employ of the United States, all of them stating, in their judgment, that he has complied with the statute. And yet that gentleman, as a Representative here, has the temerity to declare that the Secretary has admitted that he has committed the crime of embezzlement.

I think that there ought not to be an investigation of the Secretary of the Treasury, because everything that he has done has been exhibited here. No man has intimated that other facts can be discovered than those that are now before the House and the country; and while it would seem to me that there is no call for an investigation of him, there ought to be some kind of rebuke to that member of Congress who will thus distort reports, distort facts, and in his place here slander honored officials of the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS and Mr. CANNON rose.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman from Illinois on the left.

Mr. CANNON. As I want only about a half a minute and then shall ask to have the debate closed, and as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] last occupied the floor, I will yield, and hope the Chair will recognize me afterwards for five minutes.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the defense of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted by Republicans on either side of this Chamber, I desire to have read an article from the Chicago Tribune of yesterday, one of the leading Republican papers of Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is that a Republican paper?

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Yes; well known to be.

The Clerk read as follows:

EVIL DAYS FOR SECRETARY GAGE.

There was a disposition in many quarters to let the curtain fall upon the acts of the Treasury Department with reference to the recent stock panic in Wall street and to draw the mantle of charity around Secretary Gage's official measures with reference thereto. Whatever opinion the people may have had as to the wisdom of those measures, it was admitted by candid men that Mr. Gage had been actuated only by unselfish motives. That opinion remains unchanged. Mr. Gage's personal and official integrity in private or public acts can not be assailed successfully among the people who know him.

It must be said, however, that in responding to the Democratic resolution calling for information in regard to the relations of the Treasury Department to the Standard Oil bank he has put some ugly weapons in the hands of his enemies. His response, including, as it does, some letters not strictly official in their nature, and which might have been withheld as purely private, reminds one forcibly of Emory Storrs' characterization of an old and lamented member of the Cook County bar. Mr. Storrs said of him: "I do not need to look up authorities to bring into court when I have him for an opponent, as I know well he will have all there are on both sides, and I can select from them all I may need to prove my case." Mr. Gage certainly has brought all the authorities into court in this instance, including those which were most against him.

He sent to the Senate two letters which can not easily be explained away, and Republican newspapers in the East are not even attempting to explain them away. One of them was from ex-Controller A. P. Hepburn, of the National City Bank, and the other from Mr. Stillman, president of that bank. Both these letters were printed in the Tribune yesterday.

Mr. Hepburn, in his letter, asked that his bank be allowed to remain a United States depository, one reason being that "our list of directors" will show "we have great political claims, in view of what was done during the canvass last year"—1890.

Mr. Stillman, in his letter, said the call loans of the bank, then out in Wall street, were $50,000,000, and suggested that if the Secretary would defer the payments to be made by the bank to the Government on account of the Central Pacific road it would "help matters"—that is, the operations of the bank in Wall street would not be restricted by a decrease in loanable funds.

It has passed into a proverb that a cat may look at a king. So anybody may write a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury. The important fact is not that these two letters were written to Secretary Gage, but that he proceeded to act in both instances in accordance with the suggestions made to him. The public deposits in the National City Bank were increased—as Mr. Hepburn desired they should be. Those deposits rose from a few hundreds of thousands of dollars, at which sum they then stood, to ten or twelve millions per month. Furthermore, the payment to the Treasury Department of the Central Pacific money was deferred, in accordance with Mr. Stillman's suggestion, until it became convenient for the bank to hand the money over.

By his unsophisticated, guileless, and innocent transmission of these two letters to Congress Mr. Gage has convicted himself out of his own mouth and has established as true some of the gravest accusations made against the Administration by unfriendly critics. Mr. Gage has gone far, for example, to show that the National City Bank of New York deserves to be called, as it has been called by some Democratic newspapers, a "favored bank;" that the relations of the Standard Oil Company to the Treasury Department, owing to the loan of bonds to the National City Bank, upon which deposits were based (of which advances the Treasury Department was specifically informed), are not remote, and, finally, that the Treasury Department has, on occasions when it should not justly have done so, meddled and muddled in Wall street stock operations, with which the Government of the United States has properly nothing to do.

What answer Mr. Gage will make to these accusations we can not say, but it is manifest that the Treasury Department needs a censor, so that the next time it is called on to transmit a mass of correspondence to either House of Congress that correspondence may be discreetly and discriminatingly edited.

What was it or what could it be to Mr. Gage that the Standard Oil bank had immense sums loaned out in Wall street on call? How can Mr. Gage explain the fact that Government money was loaned in large sums to the Standard Oil bank when he knew it to be such and when he had been advised in official correspondence that the bonds which qualified the National City Bank to act as a depository were obtained directly from the Standard Oil Company?

How can Mr. Gage justify that letter (also officially printed) in which he suggested that the visit of Mr. Stillman or Mr. Morgan to Washington might "be more disturbing than an order on the banks to transfer all their money to the subtreasury," and consequently the Secretary of the Treasury offered to meet them in Philadelphia at the Walton Hotel in private and clandestinely at a particular time?

Was it becoming in the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to abscond from Washington to Philadelphia to meet the representatives of the Standard Oil bank or of any other financial institution in order to avoid possible public comment? Where should those representatives confer with him on business which would bear the light of day save at the office of the Secretary in the Treasury Department at the seat of Government?

We find it extremely awkward and difficult to answer some of these questions. The whole official course of Mr. Gage has been viewed by the Tribune "more in sorrow than in anger." He has fallen into every pit dug for his unwary feet by political and financial jobbers. They have taken continual advantage of his lack of experience in public affairs. Mr. Gage personally is as incorruptible as Aristides. Nobody for one instant questions his desire to serve the public faithfully and well. But owing to a one-sided education which taught him all a banker should know and little of what a public man should know, he has considered to be expedient and just things astute politicians would shrink from as imperiling their public and private reputations.

Mr. Gage has done nothing unbecoming a reputable banker. He has never asked whether any of his acts were unbecoming a Secretary of the Treasury. Any man who stood less high in the community than he does would unquestionably have subjected himself to grave suspicion. His only failing is that he has not exhibited in the conduct of public affairs the discretion of the politician as he displayed constantly in the management of a private financial institution the discretion of the banker.

The correspondent of the Chicago Record, a paper not unfriendly to Mr. Gage, said in its issue of yesterday that "it is quite safe to say Mr. Gage will not be in the next Cabinet if President McKinley should be reelected." It is perhaps as well that this information should be widely disseminated. The Republican party can not afford to stand for the policy which has been announced and thus far executed through the Treasury Department. Its affiliations with the Standard Oil Company and Wall street operators have been most unfortunate. "In spite of the callousness of so many of our business men," as the New York Evening Post says, "there is a great volume of popular wrath at and loathing for plutocracy."

During the reading of the foregoing, the time of Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS having expired, by unanimous consent, it was extended to allow the completion of the reading.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. CORLISS rose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a single word.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate on this amendment is closed.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to get ahead with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. Very well; if I may be recognized after the reading of the next paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word, and then I want to ask the House to permit this bill to be read in good faith for amendment. I started out on the supposition that a little leeway, even although remarks might not be in order if the point of order were made, would, after a little while, clear the air and that we could make progress. I hope that that may be done.

Mr. CORLISS. With the assurance that I shall have permission to move to amend further on, I will wait.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to answer at length the attack of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], or the attack of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], or anybody else, upon the Secretary of the Treasury, for the report of the Secretary of the Treasury speaks for itself. I have read it with care. I believe it is true, and for one man and one Representative I indorse every act of the Secretary of the Treasury in connection therewith. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, why go on and try to answer about Standard Oil, and about this man having committed an impeachable offense, and all that kind of thing. It is multiplying words, not worthy, in my judgment, of an answer. I can best illustrate how I feel about it by stating a recollection that I have when a boy out on the Wabash, before the day of railroads. They sometimes had religious discussions, and there was a three days' discussion between great religious lights in the neighborhood on the doctrine of election.

The old hard-shell Presbyterian of the old school took occasion in his remarks, as I recollect it, in discussing this matter of election, to say that the Lord had ordered everything from the beginning, and that there were infants in hell not a span long. There was a good old Methodist sister sitting by, and she did not go into any argument about it. She could not have disproved it any more than he could prove it, but she answered him by jumping up and crying out, "I thank my God that is a lie." [Laughter.] There is no use in multiplying words with our friends. They are just mistaken, that is all.

Now I ask that progress may be made by reading the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been closed, and without objection the formal amendment will be considered withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, telephones, books for library, miscellaneous items, and furniture and carpets for offices, care of office carriage, horses, and harness, being for the fiscal years as follows:
For the fiscal year 1900, $2,279.18.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN.]

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the question being considered here, but to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and the House to a paragraph in this bill further along and make some remarks pertaining to the department that has reference thereto.

On page 2 of the bill you will find a provision authorizing an increase in the appropriations for the Supervising Architect's Department of $40,000. We find that whenever a department has become ineffective by the dry rot of civil service it comes to Congress for an additional appropriation in order to inject a little life into that department without trying to remedy the evil within the department, and if you will bear with me for about ten minutes, as I will require that time, I desire to give to the members of this House my experience with this department of the Government, in order that they may know what the people of their districts must endure unless that department is changed to some extent.

Many of the members here have secured appropriations for the erection of public buildings in their district. One was granted to my district fourteen years ago, and at the expiration of twelve years the building was completed. When we moved into the new building it was found that the different departments were too large to go into the building, and the old public building was required. In order to utilize it it had to be repaired. Congress considered the matter and authorized the building to be retained, and in June, 1898, an appropriation of $20,000 was granted for the proper repair of that building.

The Supervising Architect's Office is entirely under the civil-service law, and the Supervising Architect, when appointed by the President, was eulogized by the Civil Service Reform League as a man entirely worthy and competent to fill that position; and I want time enough to present to this House facts that can be substantiated, in order that the people of my district, at least, will not hold me responsible for the incapacity of the Supervising Architect's Office.

In June, 1898, Congress appropriated $20,000 to repair an old public building. The plans had been submitted to the Supervising Architect upon which to base the estimate of the repairs needed. The public were paying for accommodation for public offices, the appraiser, the pension office, the Light-House Board, and other departments in my city, $7,000 a year for rental in private buildings, and we were very anxious to utilize the old building for the purpose of cutting off these expenses.

That building is not completed to-day, notwithstanding the fact that eighteen months have expired, and almost every day, every month at least, the Supervising Architect has been asked and urged and entreated to proceed to the completion of that building for the benefit of the public. He has had eighteen months to expend $20,000 for the repair of the old public building that any private owner could put in proper repair for the accommodation of the public department in that city in sixty days' time.

I believe it is my duty, sir, standing here representing the people of my city, to state these facts. This building is in the heart of our city, in one of the best business sections. The building has been closed for two years, and the merchants and business men surrounding it have complained because the building is there silent and idle when the public service requires its use.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CORLISS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I do hope my friend will content himself with moving to amend this section, if such is his intention, when it is reached.

Mr. CORLISS. I move to strike it out.

Mr. CANNON. But it has not been reached.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to stand in the position of opposing an appropriation here if the chairman and the committee's investigation of it show that it ought to be granted.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend want to be heard on this section again when it is reached?

Mr. CORLISS. Not if I am granted sufficient time to cover the facts now.

Mr. CANNON. With that statement I will not object to an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks an extension of five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CORLISS. My purpose, Mr. Chairman, in talking to the committee now is because from the discussion that is going on I am afraid the paragraph will not be reached. I do not wish to eliminate this appropriation if upon investigation the committee believes it ought to be made. I rather encourage it, but I desire to call attention of the officials of the Treasury Department to the absolute incapacity or lack of proper attention of the officers of the Architect's Department.

Now, one other step along the lines of the improvement here. Not only eighteen months have been wasted and an expenditure of $9,000 paid out by our Government for rent of private quarters because this building is not completed, but in a new public building completed and occupied by the Post-Office Department it was found that in the rear, where the mail had to come into the building, an addition should be constructed at a cost of about $500, in order to protect the mail men who come up with their carriages and unload the mail and carry it in the post-office. To-day, and for the last two years, they have been doing that work exposed to the rain and the storm, with no cover for their protection.

The Supervising Architect was asked by the postmaster and the custodian of the building and by myself and a Senator to make an extension that would cost $500 for the protection of the clerks in that new building. The money has been appropriated. He promised to do the work. He has repeatedly promised for two years to do it, but to-day the men are standing there working in the rain storms because of the incapacity or the indifference of the Supervising Architect; and I submit that such a man ought to be compelled to do the work of his department properly and for the proper economy of the people and for the interests of the section in which the building is located or he should be removed from office.

One other point. Ninety days ago, when one elevator in the new building—the one nearest the center of the city—where 90 per cent of the people enter the building for the purpose of reaching the courts and the departments above, the elevator became out of repair, and that elevator has been permitted to stand idle for ninety days, and every person who goes into the building, to the court room, and to the collector of customs' office, and to the collector of internal revenue's office is compelled to travel nearly 400 feet through the building to reach the further elevator.

I call attention to these matters because, Mr. Chairman, I have called the attention of the Supervising Architect to it and his lack of attention to these matters until I am tired, and I desire the people of my district to know that when I find a department in Washington neglecting its duty and not expending the public money in the interest of the people—for the economy of the people—I will stand upon this floor and criticize him, whether it be the Supervising Architect or any other member of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I want publicly to ask the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the facts that I have stated. I desire the committee, in the consideration of other matters that will come up with reference to the Supervising Architect, to take into consideration the statements that I have made here and to ask him whether or not he has been guilty of the charges that I make. And unless he can show greater efficiency in some other direction—in some other buildings—to overcome such neglect of public interests, I submit it is high time that he should be removed from office.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can not do it.

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says we can not do it, and I suppose he means because he is under the civil-service law. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there is a power to reach men in public life, notwithstanding the fact that they are under the civil-service law, and that power is here, and unless it is exercised pretty quickly the voice of the people will come here and demand that the entire civil-service law be repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. Without objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: For two clerks, at the rate of $900 per annum each; and six paper counters and laborers, at the rate of $620 per annum each, in the division of loans and currency; in all, $1,880.

[Mr. QUARLES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia, that he may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] made his remarks here this morning, criticizing the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, my attention has been called to a very able editorial that appeared recently in the Greenville News, of South Carolina, a leading Democratic paper of that State, which shows clearly and conclusively that the Democracy of South Carolina is not in harmony with the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] in his tirade of abuse against Mr. Gage. And to show to my Democratic friends and my Republican colleagues how the rank and file of the Democracy view the action of Secretary Gage, I ask the Clerk to read such portions of the editorial as I have marked.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:

TO BRETHREN.

One of the most pressing needs of the South is breadth of view and modern thought in our newspapers. It is a depressing fact that most of the local newspapers in this section are running in the ruts of thirty years ago. They have not caught the spirit of freedom and independence that guides and governs the world of to-day. They hark back to old and dead issues, stick to old methods, are apparently unable to comprehend the changes that have come. Our observation is that the newspapers are far behind the people. In cities and towns and the country alike we find men and women thinking for themselves and considering political conditions from businesslike points of view, studying the effects of public issues and matters on the interests of themselves and their surroundings. Most of the newspapers, on the other hand, are thinking the thoughts of dead men or flocking along blindly after leaders, more or less blind, following empty names and guiding themselves by unmeaning and useless sentiment.

We are moved to these observations by the dismay, bewilderment, and anger which many of our esteemed contemporaries express from time to time because of things said and done by the Greenville News. They can not understand how it is that a Democratic newspaper warmly approves many of the policies and acts of a Republican Administration and disapproves the policies and acts of men who call themselves Democrats and of a God-forsaken band of political vagrants who blasphemously call themselves the Democratic party. In the honest opinion of many of these contemporaries such a thing is impossible. A newspaper which does not decry and snarl at, misrepresent, and belittle every act of a Republican Administration and abuse every Republican official must, they think, be Republican.

It [a contemporary] can not understand why this newspaper should defend Mr. Gage, the Republican Secretary of the Treasury, against Mr. SULZER, the Democratic Congressman from New York. Mr. Gage is a man who, by his integrity, ability, and energy, put himself at the head of the banking business in one of the world's largest cities. He is recognized by the whole world as an authority on finance. He has proved that his knowledge is accurate and practical by successfully managing great financial enterprises. Considering Mr. Gage's history, we find it hard to believe that he has made any very serious error in financial management or has joined in with anybody to rob the Government or to openly and flagrantly use Government funds to enrich himself or his friends. On the other hand, we know Mr. SULZER, of New York, to be a cheap and frothy East Side Tammany politician, a man who has never given any evidence of talent or learning or ability of any kind.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

We know that the attack on Mr. Gage was led by the New York World and Journal, newspapers which live by being sensational and which notoriously disregard truth. Using this general knowledge of the men concerned and applying common sense, we said that when Mr. Gage's actions were investigated it would be found that he had acted wisely and honestly. We can not accept the fact that Mr. Gage is part of a Republican Administration as proof that he is fool or knave or both; nor can we regard Mr. SULZER as a statesman and master of finance because he calls himself a Democrat. Now, Mr. Gage's answer is before the public. It seems to us to prove that he had sound reasons for placing the Government money as he did and to make the clamor against him absurd. We think the business men of the whole country, who study affairs in a businesslike and open-minded way, will have the same opinion. Of course, the newspapers which hold blind partisanship to be their first and whole duty will continue to demand Mr. Gage's impeachment.

The weakness and folly of the partisanship of most of the Southern newspapers will be best understood if we suppose the case reversed. Suppose Mr. McKinley proceeded on the theory that a Democrat could be honest or trustworthy. There would not be a Democratic postmaster of any grade or census official or any other Federal officer anywhere in the country. If he chose to show the feeling toward the South which so many Southern newspapers show toward him, he could make this a hell on earth.

The Administration has fought and won a war and has treated the South kindly in every way. The whole country is prospering as it has not prospered in years. Our State is going ahead with a rush. We have every reason to be satisfied. The Greenville News will not deny these plain facts, nor, because the men under whose guidance these facts are developed are called Republicans, snarl at or abuse or belittle them. Nor will we cry out to try the experiment of handing the Government over to a lot of men because they call themselves Democrats, whose methods and principles we believe would bring disaster on the country. We are following common sense and principles, not names and empty sentiments; we are dealing with the facts as they are now, not with facts as they were in reconstruction days, or the memories of wrongs done by men who are dead. We are living in to-day and looking to tomorrow, and are not living in 1876 and looking to 1865. We are going forward, not backward, looking around at the world and seeing; not raking in old muck heaps, like the man in Pilgrim's Progress.

The Greenville News is a Democratic newspaper because it believes in Democratic principles and holds to them; it approves most of the policies and methods of the Administration because they accord with those principles and the country is prospering, booming, growing under them. It will not, because Bryan, Altgeld, and Tillman call themselves Democrats, go with them into the Populist camp or help to hand a machine which is running smoothly and beautifully to them to tamper and tinker and try fool experiments with.

We would be glad to have many Southern contemporaries study the situation and stand with us.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman know that that was a paper that supported President McKinley in 1896?

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I sought to introduce on the 4th of January seems to be no longer necessary to elicit the facts which I then desired from the Secretary of the Treasury. I believed at that time that the Secretary of the Treasury neither appreciated nor understood the financial situation in New York and elsewhere during the last three months of 1899. I have read his voluminous report, and I find no reason therein for changing my belief.

To his failure to act at the right time, when repeatedly requested to do so, may be charged the late stringency in the money market, so largely affecting banking and business interests, and the facts admitted in his report prove that he is directly responsible for the serious conditions existing at that time.

I thought it was proper that the people of the United States, and especially the citizens of New York, should know why the Secretary delayed in exercising the power which section 5153 of the Revised Statutes gives him, and which he now invokes in his defense, and why he finally availed himself of this authority when the panic was over.

That a severe stringency of money has lately affected business interests in New York and throughout the country no one who reads can doubt. That the Secretary was advised of its approach and its causes no one can dispute. If the means of averting the panic were available at all times, why did the Secretary lack the foresight or neglect to make use of them?

As early as September 27, 1899, I urged the Secretary of the Treasury to relieve the threatened stringency and sent him the following telegram:

I respectfully urge that you use every means possible to relieve the present tension in the money market. That in the midst of such prosperity there should be a dearth of money to transact the country's business, the same being due solely to absorption by the Treasury, through taxation, of the surplus, would be ludicrous were it not so costly to the farmer, mechanic, and business man alike. Every resource should be exhausted to promptly end the present stringency.

The Secretary replied through his Assistant Secretary that the Government was not absorbing money needed in business circles; that the receipts and expenditures of the Government almost balanced from day to day, and that he had relieved the situation by anticipating the October interest. And in further response to my inquiry, wherein I warned him that every day's delay in affording relief meant a month's delay in the progress of the prosperity of the people, and that the larger national banks with deposits of $25,000,000 and over had a selfish interest in maintaining a close money market—as everyone at that time knew, and as subsequent events prove—he replied that “it does not appear at this time that there is any great necessity for increasing deposits in national banks, and to do so in the case of New York banks would likely invite criticism of unfair discrimination against other sections of the country desiring also to be the recipients of deposits.” And, further, that “whatever stringency there is in the market at this season of the year must therefore be attributed to some other reason than the absorption of the money of the country by the Treasury.” This letter was written on the 6th of November, 1899.

The Secretary, in these letters, would neither admit a stringency nor permit himself to believe that it was due to the accumulation of the surplus in the Treasury. In fact he denied that there was a surplus.

Within three weeks thereafter he offered to purchase $25,000,000 of bonds, thereby admitting that some relief was necessary and proving that a surplus did exist. And in his reply to the Senate resolution of inquiry he further shows that his statement in his letter was erroneous, when he declares that revenue receipts are increasing from month to month and that the business world demanded assurances that this surplus should be diverted from Treasury vaults to public depositories.

The business world had been demanding this for some months prior to the Secretary's action, but he was not prepared or was unwilling to comply with its demands. The prepayment of the October interest was trifling, while the purchase of bonds did not afford relief to the business world, but did advance the price of these bonds $20,000,000, which the Government will have to pay when the generally announced refunding plan is put in operation.

The Secretary either erred in judgment or was illy advised by those most interested in a continuance of the stringency in the money market, and every citizen who has contributed through taxation to make possible the surplus in the Treasury is compelled to criticize the grave blunder—for it is nothing less—which the Secretary committed in his subsequent action.

Forgetful of, or ignoring entirely, his written statement that a surplus did not exist and that, even if it did, unfavorable criticism would be invited if he deposited Government receipts in New York banks, when the panic was at its acutest stage, when the enormous rate of 186 per cent was charged for call money, when the tension was so great that private relief came to the assistance of banks, then the Secretary selected the very institution which by reason of its large deposits and financial ramifications was able to dictate the price of money until prohibitive rates had been reached, and that institution was made the chief depository of Government funds.

I do not charge collusion, but I do maintain that the Secretary lacked financial judgment.

However, the Secretary was too late, and the evil which he failed to avert had already overwhelmed banking and business houses. One instance of its far-reaching result may be cited from New England.

During the months of October, November, and December banking failures in New England aggregated in amount $14,000,000, while for the entire year failures in the same section of the country amounted to $14,207,585; or, in other words, for nine months failures only reached the sum of $207,585, while for the three months during which time the Secretary refused to grant relief failures aggregated $14,000,000.

The Secretary, in his reply to the Senate resolution of inquiry, gives as his second reason for depositing internal-revenue receipts and utilizing national banks as depositaries the following:

Second. . . . That the revenues are now largely exceeding disbursements from month to month and seem likely to do so for an indefinite period. This condition would be a menace to the business world if assurance were not given that this surplus would be diverted from Treasury vaults to public depositaries, where, while secure to the Government, it would remain available to public use.

This is precisely what the Secretary had been urged to do on November 6, 1899, and had refused to do, saying "that there was no necessity for increased deposits in national banks," and "that the stringency in the money market must not be attributed to the absorption of money of the country by the Treasury."

I am not one of those who criticize the Secretary for depositing the internal-revenue receipts in national banks—as he had authority to do—but I desire to emphasize and insist upon this fact, that his delay in making such deposits brought on the late stringency, and that he was either ignorant of the true situation or carelessly refused to heed the warnings given to him, and willfully neglected to take steps to prevent a panic. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary, by his great and serious blunder, and by his failure to grasp the recent financial situation, has not only involved his Department and this Administration in a scandal which can not be explained, but has deliberately interfered with the progress of our prosperity. Fortunately, this country is so great and resourceful that it will only halt in its advance to wonder at the blindness of the Secretary and then progress with renewed activity.

The world depends upon us for bread. The East needs our cotton and manufactures. As we have expanded as a nation, in that direction will we expand as a mercantile power. We will supply Europe with iron, and I believe the day is not far distant when we will supply her with coal. The day has passed when we are compelled to appeal to the money centers of Europe for money to aid our enterprises. New York is fast becoming the financial center of the world, and with a liberal but discriminating hand she extends aid to all parts of the United States. If, however, we are to be subjected to the favoritism and mistakes in financial policy such as we have witnessed during the closing months of the past year, confidence will be shaken in our financial system at home and abroad, and other crises will be precipitated, each more disastrous in its effect.

The lesson which this short-sighted policy of the Secretary of the Treasury teaches is that when the reason for a tax ceases to exist, the tax should be abolished if the surplus derived therefrom becomes a menace to industrial and commercial enterprises, and pending its abolition the surplus should be controlled by some able financier. To lock it up in the vaults of the Treasury withdraws it from business channels. The Secretary can not go on indefinitely purchasing bonds and depositing receipts without charging interest therefor in national banks. The money belongs to the people, who contributed it to the Government through taxation; and if a surplus is gradually accumulating, the tax which is responsible for it should be decreased in proportion as the surplus has increased. If the Secretary of the Treasury is able to deposit $30,000,000 to $40,000,000, which will represent the surplus for this year, as he says in his reply, and if in addition thereto he is able to purchase $25,000,000 of bonds, this surplus should be returned to the people by reducing the war tax by exactly that amount. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the above remarks the time of Mr. LEVY expired.

Mr. LEVY. I ask for five minutes' more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. As this is the closing speech of debate by consent, I hope it will be given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LEVY resumed and concluded his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Treasury Department: For three clerks of class 1, $900.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I sat here a few moments ago and listened with a great deal of interest to the debate that occurred between the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and the equally distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. DRIGGS. I believe that is the end of the paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it is the end of the paragraph.

Mr. DRIGGS. I only ask for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. But no amendment is offered, and I do want to conclude this bill to-day.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman is proceeding out of order except by unanimous consent. I will ask unanimous consent for five minutes for debate that is not relevant to the bill on that side and five minutes to this side, and then we proceed with the bill in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That applies to this section, as I understand.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I want to go on with the bill.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. We have a census bill to-morrow and a pension bill the next day, when the gentlemen can get in their speeches.

Mr. DRIGGS. The opportunity will be lost if we have to wait. The opportunity is here. I believe I am recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Why, then I absolutely give notice, so that there may be no mistake about it, that after ten minutes further debate—

Mr. DRIGGS. Does this come out of my time?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, not at all. (Continuing:) By consent, and I will insist upon the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. DRIGGS. To proceed, then. With the controversy between the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri I have no desire to take issue, for each of them are trumps in their respective ways. I might say that one is the ace of hearts and the other is the ace of diamonds, for one is all heart as a Democrat, and the other a bright diamond in the principles of the Democracy in which he believes.

But, sir, I do take issue with the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois a few minutes ago when he alluded to the Republicans on that side of the House and the Republicans on this side. I intend to apply that to myself, for he unquestionably alludes to the so-called Gold Democrats on this side of the Chamber. I intend to say, if you please, that whenever the issue about circulation of money comes up, or whenever any debate may occur in this House, wherever any question is raised on any financial matters, it seems that some Democrat on this side of the House takes an opportunity to attack some of their fellow-Democrats who do not chance to believe with them in the theory of the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

I say now, Mr. Chairman, in that much-misused phrase, "I am a Democrat," that I am as good a Democrat as there is on the floor of this House. And my colleagues who stood with me on this side of the House in support of the gold-currency measure, introduced by the other side, are as good Democrats as there are on this side of the House.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, to what are we entitled in our Democracy, and what do we believe in as Democrats? There is no man on this side of the House who is a firmer believer in a constitutional amendment for the purpose of establishing an income tax than I. There is no man on this side of the House who is more bitterly opposed to the doctrines of the President, and for which the Republican party is solid, for the passage of a ship subsidy bill.

There is no Democrat on this side of the House who is more opposed to the increase of the standing army; and I believe absolutely that the welfare and the future integrity and the strength of this nation are to be placed in the Volunteer Army, that army in which Jackson and Jefferson and all our great generals have had implicit confidence, and, sir, there is no Representative on this side of the House more opposed to the trusts than I.

Coming now to the present question, I hold, sir, when certain Democrats would set themselves on a pedestal of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and say to every class of Democrat, "Unless you fall down and worship this idol you are no Democrat," they are the violators of the first principles of Democracy, for these principles are free speech, freedom of action, freedom of right, and freedom of debate; and my constituents of the Third Congressional district in the State of New York, more than 21,000 of whom, out of a total vote of 41,000 votes cast, told me on election day of November 8, 1898, that I was a Democrat, and as a Democrat was elected to this House of Representatives. I care not what you may say about my Republicanism, and my Democratic constituency will tell this House this coming November whether my Democracy is satisfactory to them.

I am not a Republican. "I am a Democrat."

As such I believe in the gold standard, and I can be as radical in that belief as you, my colleagues, in your free and unlimited coinage ideas, for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 is not bimetalism; it is silver monometallism. Now that this debate has come up here to-day, should we of the Democracy not be willing to concede something?

Why should we not be willing to say, "You go a certain way and we will go a certain way?" And surely we can meet on common ground somewhere instead of going before the country as we do, and as members have done on this side, calling us Republicans when we are not. For one, I say it is unfair to certain Democrats on this side of the House. And we are all Democrats; not one Republican can be found sitting here, excepting in the "Cherokee Strip." If there is any breach in our ranks, let us close, not widen, it. Why not make a serious and earnest attempt to meet on some common ground that will absolutely unite and not disunite the great Democratic party?

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Furnishing new post-office building, Washington, D. C.: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide the new post-office building, Washington, D. C., with furniture, including gas and electric-light fixtures, carpets, awnings, window shades, $5,500.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "dollars," in line 6, page 4, the following: "Also, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide the new post-office building in Kansas City, Mo., with elevators to complete that building, $35,000."

Mr. CANNON. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, and for the following reason: The limit of cost of the public building in Kansas City has been appropriated for, and this breaks the limit, goes clear beyond the limit, and because it changes existing law; therefore it is not in order under the rule in relation to general appropriation bills.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman from Illinois was through.

Mr. CANNON. I want the point of order disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped the gentleman from Illinois might withhold the point of order on that amendment, because of the very urgent need of the Government for the appropriation. Permit me to say in passing, while it is not just on the point of order, that if this appropriation is held up, as it probably must be for several months unless it goes in this bill, every month of that time will cost the Government from six to eight hundred dollars additional. The new post-office building at Kansas City is practically completed excepting elevators and some finishing work. A portion of the Government offices will be moved into it in the spring, and some must move as soon as possible, as they are now occupying rented premises and their leases either have expired or soon will expire. Other officials, and especially the courts, can not move until the elevators are in place. Thus the Government will be compelled to maintain both buildings, necessitating a double force of janitors and engineers and a largely increased cost of maintenance.

Now, on the point of order, I contend that an urgent deficiency bill is not a general appropriation bill, and therefore is not included in the bills mentioned in the second section of Rule XXI. If I remember rightly, in the rule as it stood originally the general appropriation bills were specifically mentioned, and later the rule was changed so as to include deficiency bills with general appropriation bills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a deficiency bill is a general appropriation bill, but I contend that it must be a general deficiency bill, not a special deficiency bill. When the gentleman brought in the deficiency bill at the last Congress appropriating $50,000,000 for the support of the Army, he did not bring it in as a general bill under the rule, but asked unanimous consent for its consideration. When he brought in a deficiency bill appropriating about $40,000, $5,000 for the payment of special and temporary clerks in this House, and something over $30,000 for the payment of clerks under the revenue department, and $1,900 for the payment of election expenses, three or four different items appropriating about $40,000, it was not contended that it was a deficiency appropriation bill that would come under the rule that is raised in this case.

Now, there can be but one deficiency bill, and that is a general appropriation bill. Otherwise, Mr. Chairman, where will you draw the line?

If they can bring in an urgent deficiency appropriation bill, then they can bring in a special urgent deficiency appropriation bill. If they can not include three items, as was specially held on the floor of the House, I ask you whether twenty items make a general deficiency bill? General appropriation bills are those named in the old rule and one or two added since, one of which is the general deficiency bill, and I contend, therefore, that the rule as laid down is not applicable to items enumerated in this bill, because this is not one of the general appropriation bills.

Next, this is public work already in progress, a work appropriated for, a work that has almost reached completion. The Chair will remember that in the last House, when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] offered an amendment on an appropriation bill providing for the erection of new buildings at Annapolis, at the Naval Academy, it was held to be in order, after a long and exhaustive debate, because it was a work already in progress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a single word in reply to the gentleman from Missouri. Rule XI, fixing the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, says:

To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz, for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions, and for all deficiencies: to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, this bill on inspection—and the Chair must inspect it—speaks for itself. It is entitled "A bill making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies," etc., "and for other purposes," covering some 40 or 50 pages, carrying between fifty and sixty million dollars. It is, in fact, the principal deficiency bill. Now, under this grant of jurisdiction, I do not understand that you are confined to one bill. You may report several deficiency bills. There is nothing in the rule that would prevent the reporting of two so-called sundry civil bills or two legislative bills. You could make a general bill for each Department, if you saw proper, under this rule. As to the other point, that this is a public work in progress—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to take the floor to say anything, but I want to ask the gentlemen if the rule does not define what a general appropriation bill is?

Mr. CANNON. It does not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does it not mention the general appropriation bills?

Mr. CANNON. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman will find that the general appropriation bills are mentioned.

Mr. CANNON (reading). "And for all deficiencies."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that, but look at Rule XXI and see if it does not mention the general appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking of the grant of power. This says "and for all deficiencies."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to be understood as either favoring or opposing the point of order, because it is a matter that I have seen decided here, and I was rather inclined to be in favor of the position the gentleman is taking, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] first mentioned it to me; but you will find that general appropriation bills are mentioned there.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is speaking of Rule XXI now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have been reading from Rule XI.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know that, but Rule XXI mentions the general appropriation bills, and says they shall be in order when reported from the Committee on Appropriations. The question is whether the urgent deficiency bill is a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I will read clause 2 of Rule XXI:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Now, this is a general deficiency appropriation bill; or, if the gentleman sees proper to look at it in that way, a general urgent deficiency appropriation bill, consisting of many items, and I think it comes within the letter of the rule, and certainly within the spirit of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman at all, but on that line would you not find some difficulty in that position, when you consider that there is a general deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A bill that you call the general deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. There may be two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman is correct in saying that there can be two general deficiency bills, and that an urgent deficiency bill is one of the two general deficiency bills, then he would have no difficulty in his position.

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You do not call it that in the rule. Why do you not call it a general deficiency bill? You come and call it an urgent deficiency bill and make no provision that that shall be privileged.

Mr. CANNON. Rule XI does not speak of any general deficiency bill. It is peculiar in that respect. I will again read clause 3 of Rule XI:

To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz, for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions, and for all deficiencies: to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COWHERD. I hope the gentleman has not misunderstood my argument. I do not contend that this matter would not properly come before the Committee on Appropriations, but I contended that it would not come in under Rule XXI, because this was not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, I say it is a general appropriation bill, and in point of fact, on inspection, I think it is the most general deficiency appropriation that has been reported for many a long year in the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is the biggest one.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; covering fifty or sixty pages, and that it is within both the letter and spirit of the rule. What was the object of clause 2 of Rule XXI? It was to prevent legislation upon the great money bills, because there was an evil attending such legislation, namely, that the great money bills must pass or the Government must stop. Therefore it was not good legislation to hitch on legislative provisions to the money bills that must pass and let them drag through obnoxious legislative provisions or legislative provisions not carefully considered. Therefore this rule was made. Now, it comes within the letter and spirit of the prohibition in clause 2. As to the gentleman's other point, a word, and then I will close:

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill.

Now, what is the existing law? That there shall be constructed at Kansas City a public building expressly provided for, not exceeding a certain limit. Now, that limit has been appropriated for; and when you go beyond the legislation, and appropriate additional money for that public building, it changes the existing law, namely, that the building shall not cost exceeding $2,000,000, if that is the limit.

Then there is another class of public works that abound in appropriation, and clause 2 refers to that class of works, where they are in progress, where a beginning has been made without limitation, and then appropriations for such public works are in order upon appropriation bills. But this is not one of the class referred to.

I am ready to have the Chair rule.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, one further word. In regard to the question of the work being in progress, I am willing to admit that it has been ruled by former occupants of the chair that such an appropriation as this did not come within the exceptions to the rule of a work in progress. But I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that ruling was opposed by no less a parliamentarian than Thomas B. Reed, the late Speaker of this House, when it was made.

Now, in regard to the question whether this is a general appropriation bill or not, the gentleman says they might bring in several general appropriation bills. I submit to the Chair that they can not bring in several general appropriation bills affecting one particular subject. They can not bring in several general deficiency bills, because one general deficiency bill covers the general deficiencies, and others like this are special deficiencies; and the gentleman recognized that twice in the last House, when he brought in bills of that nature before this House and asked unanimous consent for their passage instead of putting them upon the question of privilege.

Mr. CANNON. My friend can not claim that such action makes a concession upon my part that he is correct in that argument. During the Spanish war I did, every day or two, come in and report bills carrying sometimes one item, sometimes two or three, sometimes without printing. And for convenience—because it was the quickest and easiest way, without raising any question—I asked unanimous consent to consider them; and, so far as I recollect, without regard to the rules, with a patriotic spirit on both sides, we did not stop to inquire what the rules were, but the subject itself carried the unanimous consent.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. CANNON. If I can.

Mr. COWHERD. Is it not a fact that a few years ago—I do not know just when—when there was a deficiency in the payment of fees to marshals and jurors in the United States courts—did not the gentleman bring in a bill appropriating some $375,000, and was it not ruled that that was not a general appropriation bill and did not come under the rule?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect such a ruling. The gentleman may be right. I do not say that it is not so, but I do not recollect it. But even if it were so, that is nothing; it sheds no light upon this point of order, in my judgment.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BERRY. I am interested in this proposition, and I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. BERRY. In the Fifty-third Congress there was an appropriation of $75,000 made for the construction of a building at Newport, Ky. The Government has only started the foundation at that point after a delay of six years, perhaps. Owing to the dilatory methods of the preceding Secretary of the Treasury nothing was done during his administration, or during the present Administration, I suppose from the fact that the office of the Secretary of the Treasury is overcharged with work. For if I have discovered anything in the six or seven years that I have been coming to Washington it is the fact that the Treasury Department has too much work to do. They take charge of the light-houses upon the seaboard; they take charge of the revenue cutters; they take charge of a dozen things with which the Treasury Department has really no business and which ought to be committed to some other department of the Government.

The lights on the seaboard and certain harbors and the Geodetic Survey belong to the Navy and ought to be attended to by the Navy Department. That is the reason why the Treasury Department does not have ample time to do the work which is submitted to it by Congress. Mr. Gage sent a person to Newport who was very incompetent, and they located upon a place that had been dug half way to China heretofore, and about 20 per cent perhaps of the cost of the building has been consumed in finding a foundation. The Secretary submitted the matter to an eminent engineer named Mr. Heuer, and Mr. Heuer sent somebody else, and he sent somebody else, to determine whether or not that was proper ground for the construction of the building, and they finally determined it was proper ground on which to construct the building.

A large part of the appropriation for the building has been consumed in finding a foundation upon ground that was improperly selected and by people who knew nothing about it. One of the consequences has been that while the building that was designed could have been built within the appropriation, the whole amount of which was $75,000, they have now but $62,000 left to construct the building. It could have been constructed within the appropriation, but owing to the rise in the price of material and labor that building has had to be curtailed until it will not be a respectable building for the United States.

They have taken off the glazed bricks with which it was intended to make it beautiful and make it a respectable building; and I think that this urgent deficiency bill is the proper place to include an appropriation of $10,000 to make that building such as it was originally intended to be, and to make it creditable to our Government. I would like, therefore, that this point should not be sustained. Although not authorized by law, it is authorized by the necessity of the case, because it will enable the Government to erect a building that will be a credit to it. That is what I want done, and there are a number of other places in the same position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the pending paragraph, to which the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that it is not in order because of the provisions of Rule XXI, section 2, which reads:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

In the opinion of the Chair, following the precedents, the point of order must be sustained if the pending bill is a general appropriation bill. The gentleman from Missouri, however, urges that the pending bill is not a general appropriation bill, and therefore that section 2 of Rule XXI does not apply; and in support of his position he cites the introduction into the House on two previous occasions of deficiency appropriation bills that were admitted, according to the method then pursued, not to be general appropriation bills. In each of those cases, however, it will be observed that the subject-matter of the bill could have been covered in a single paragraph. In other words, the bill covered but a single subject, and it was beyond pretense that they could be regarded as general appropriation bills.

Mr. COWHERD. If the Chair will pardon me, I cited one instance where the bill covered the payment of clerks of the House, the payment of election expenses, and the payment of new clerks brought into the revenue department in connection with oleomargarine.

The CHAIRMAN. What the gentleman says may be true, but it is also true there was no pretense that the bills contained subject-matter relating to the Departments of the Government or a majority of the Departments of the Government. There is a vast distinction between the bills to which the gentleman refers and the bill before the House. This bill carries the sum of $38,000,000. It deals with the executive department, the War Department, the Navy Department, the District of Columbia, and various other subjects. It is manifestly on its face a general bill, and in the opinion of the Chair must be so considered.

It is urged that the Committee on Appropriations can not present more than one general appropriation bill under any particular heading. There is nothing, so far as the judgment of the Chair goes, to prevent the Committee on Appropriations from dividing their general appropriation bills in case of necessity for such action on their part. The reason for the adoption of Rule XXI, section 2, was to prevent general legislation upon appropriation bills, and there is no reason why Rule XXI should be applicable to any general appropriation bill that does not apply with equal force to the one that is now before the House.

Without undertaking to put the decision at all upon this proposition, the Chair suggests that it may be a question whether or not the point made by the gentleman from Missouri can now be entertained. This bill was introduced into the House as a general appropriation bill. The right to so introduce it was recognized as a privileged right; it was submitted to the Committee of the Whole as a general appropriation bill. No member rose in his place, either when the bill was presented or when it was committed to the Committee of the Whole House, to object that it was not a general appropriation bill, and it may very well be held that it is now too late to raise that question.

The House went into Committee of the Whole to consider it under the rules, and without placing the decision upon that ground at all, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest to the Chair that at the time the bill was introduced all points of order were reserved, and it would include this point.

The CHAIRMAN. While that is true, this point of order should have been made in the House when the House resolved to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For rent of building now occupied by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for storage and other purposes, at a rental of $90 a month, $720.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think that this is an opportune moment to call the attention of the House to certain other conditions now existing, which seem to me ought to have consideration and given as much weight as the grave charges that have been brought against the Secretary of the Treasury.

We have, on this side of the House at least, ideas and opinions regarding the action of the Secretary, but we have been told, and of course are fully satisfied, that any facts, arguments, or illustrations we may bring can be decisively answered, in the language of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], by any Republican simply saying "it isn't so." [Laughter.]

We have the further assurance of my genial colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that all of our rights will be preserved and that we can be made perfectly happy if we will only come into the presence of the omnipotent Committee on Rules. With these most gratifying and generous assurances, I am content to remark that just at this present moment the New York bank scandal may rest in the background, as I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, another specimen of wrong and outrage. There is in this special case no vast amount of money involved, but it is an instance where an injustice has been done and a fraud perpetrated.

In the administration of the business affairs of a great nation like ours, those who are connected with such administration, and especially those who legislate for the general country, become accustomed to the consideration of large amounts. When we speak of millions on this floor no attention is paid to it, even if those millions are connected with fraudulent transactions on the part of high officials. It is true that when we charge specific acts, name the time, place, and amount, my esteemed friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] rises to deny the charge, and the rosy red of indignation upon his brow, as he contemplates our temerity, is almost as sincere as his New York banker namesake when he wrote his famous, or notorious, letter to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury on their personal affairs; but this which I hold in my hands is a contract a small star-route subcontract, but it is a case of a specific act of wrong, outrage, combination, and conspiracy on the part of men who to-day hold contracts under this Government, men who are committing acts that if they were to commit in the ordinary course of business, and were drawn before the ordinary court of justice, would lead them to the penitentiary. And yet, when I go to the head of the great Post-Office Department, I am told that they are powerless, that they can not correct the wrong, that the remedy lies here with us, in Congress assembled, and that the Postmaster-General has appealed to us year after year and no action has been taken to provide a remedy.

He admits that under the star-route system, as now established by law, there has been continuous swindling, day after day and year after year.

In this special instance from my own district a contract was made, through fraudulent representations, in which it is required that a carrier shall travel over 6,000 miles per annum for the paltry sum of $200. The agent of the contractor came, hunted up a boy 16 years of age, and by falsehood induced him to try to do the work. To succeed, he wrote broadly across the margin of the copy of the contract given to the boy, "This contract is for six months," while in the body of the instrument it reads "for four years." Then when the six months had expired, by letters threatening the boy that if he throws up the job the Federal officers will arrest him and put him in prison, and his father, who is on his bond, will lose his little home, the agent compels the boy to continue. As I said, I appealed to the Postmaster-General, and was told that the Department could take no action, so I wrote the boy to quit.

I spoke to the gentleman having charge of the legislation affecting post-roads, and was told that he objected to any legislation in this direction, because it is the desire of the Department to control the star routes itself, but he preferred to have the work being done, as now, under the subcontract system. I am not condemning the action of the Department. I am trying to arouse this body to a realization of conditions that exist all over the country, and an evil which Congress alone can remedy.

It is well known to every member of this House that there exist star-route syndicates—"speculative bidders" is their official designation—who, according to the estimate of the Postmaster-General, secure a profit of nearly $150,000 per year on subcontracts, to the detriment of the mail service.

I appeal to the members of this House, among whom there are at least one hundred who are cognizant of similar cases in their own district, to come to the relief of the Post-Office Department in this particular. Give it authority to act, so that the National Government may not continue to be, morally at least, if not legally, participes criminis in fraud and outrage. Let us enact some law that will enable the Postmaster-General to stop these scandals, which have been riotous in our mail service from the days of President Grant to the present hour, and which even now are worse than in the earlier days of star-route investigations.

I do not propose or care at this time to go more fully into details of the star-route system. It has been of a cancerous growth and is affecting our whole body politic. The time is now ripe, it seems to me, to make such change as will tend to its purification. While there are greater evils existing and questions of more profound moment, yet let not the righting of this one wrong be overshadowed and forgotten.

I hope that some time during this session we may have the opportunity, through the kindness and courtesy of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and the Committee on Rules, to take some decisive action on this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $50,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, on page 5 of this bill we find that there is a deficiency because of the "transportation of minor coin," and now we are on a provision at page 8 where a deficiency of $50,000 appears for freight on bullion and coin.

A few weeks ago, on my way to San Francisco to bring back our gallant First Tennessee Regiment to their native heath, our party stopped at New Orleans. We were carried through the mint, and while I was there there drove up at least one and I think two heavily laden express wagons of the Adams or Southern Express Company, one or the other. I asked, "What is the immense load on the wagons?" The mint officer present in charge said it was silver bullion that was being brought from Philadelphia to be coined into money at the New Orleans mint. I said, "Do you mean to tell me that the United States Government is transporting for the purpose of mintage bullion from the mint at Philadelphia?"

He told me it was an everyday business and seemed to be very much surprised that such was the law and that such was the fact. He was not any more surprised than I was, because I remember only a few months back the Democratic party on the floor of this House opposed the closing of the mint at New Orleans, which the Republicans seemed to be determined upon, and it was only by a fierce fight that we saved it.

The Republicans undertook to shut up that mint because they said it was of no use, which we see is untrue. Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the silver bullion or the silver bars which come from what the Republican party seeks to call the unpatriotic States, "rotten boroughs" of the West—States which the Republican party, by the way, admitted into the Union and which they are now constantly denouncing because those States support the free coinage of silver—I say it is possible that this law is to be perpetuated for the transportation of bullion from the far West to Philadelphia and then transported to New Orleans for the purpose of coinage?

The Democrats fought to keep open this mint to avoid, among others, this very thing—this long haul from the West to the East, thence south to New Orleans—at the expense of the Government. Here is a deficit, Mr. Chairman, a deficit superinduced by hauling this bullion from the far West to the far East, that seems to want everything or nothing, and then the transportation to almost the very last point on the southern shore of our country.

I am proud, Mr. Chairman, to have a chance to bring to the attention of this House and to exploit the record of my party on this question and to rehearse the illustrious reasons the Democratic party gave for keeping that mint open, which is turning out millions of dollars of silver money—showing it is necessary—helping us on in our patriotic aims at home and abroad. But I ask myself the question again to-day, as I did in New Orleans, is it possible that the Republican party can do anything in this country which is not done in the interests of trusts or railroads that perpetuate that party in power?

Why should the silver bullion be brought from the far West to Philadelphia and then sent to New Orleans for coinage? Why not send it from the West to New Orleans at first, as we suggested, thus saving time and money to the Government? But no. The railroads above the Ohio, operating from the West to the East, must have a chance and get it. They have a "pull" with the Republicans, and hence get to haul this freight, first East to the mint, then their Atlantic and Gulf allies finish up the "job" by hauling it to the far South, and the Government foots the bill—a deficit which we are now considering. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

For continuing the employment during the three months beginning April 1, 1900, of such additional temporary force of clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the needs of the service may demand, $150,000. Persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation, or to be transferred from any position in the classified service to positions paid hereunder.

For postage stamps for the War Department and its bureaus, as required under the Postal Union, to prepay postage on matters addressed to Postal Union countries, $500.

During the reading of the foregoing, Mr. LLOYD rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. RIXEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the concluding portion of the paragraph just passed. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, after the word "dollars," in line 22, page 11, the residue of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Appointments under this appropriation shall be made in compliance with existing law."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order; in fact, make the point of order, first, that that paragraph has been passed, and second, that this is in compliance with existing law for this temporary force. I will say to the gentleman that there was the same provision last year, and for nine months this year, and this continues the status of this temporary force for the remaining three months of the year. For both reasons it seems to me the amendment is not in order.

Mr. RIXEY. As I understand, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. What does the gentleman from Virginia have to say to the first objection that is made, that the paragraph had been passed.

Mr. RIXEY. I have this to say: I intended to offer that amendment to this paragraph, but before the Clerk had concluded the reading of the paragraph the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. LLOYD) was upon his feet addressing the Chair. It was my intention to offer the amendment as soon as I could get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. RIXEY. As I understand the paragraph, Mr. Chairman, it places the sum of $150,000 at the disposal of the Secretary of War for the employment of clerks and other employees of the Government. I am not here to defend the civil-service law, and I would be perfectly willing to let this paragraph stand, provided we could have any assurance that the money would be disbursed in a fair way to both sides.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is for temporary clerks, who were employed only about a year ago; and if the gentleman will look at the hearings before the committee, he will find that it is shown that they are equally efficient with those who might be supplied through the classified service. This is for the purpose of continuing them for three months longer. There can be no harm in continuing for twelve months clerks who are equally as proficient and perhaps more efficient than those that may be secured through the civil service.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman now answer me a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. Under this provision can not the Secretary of War appoint additional clerks?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If he needs them.

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly. I do not deny he can get as good clerks out of the civil service as he can get through that service, but what I contend is, we have a law upon the subject and we ought to follow it. I see no reason why we should place $150,000 at the disposal of the Secretary of War, who will naturally use it for the appointment of clerks, chiefly the friends of his own political party.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. The amount of the appropriation for the temporary clerks heretofore is larger than this amount. The force has been organized since the breaking out of the war by the appointment of temporary clerks only. That force is being largely reduced from month to month, and this appropriation is much smaller than if the original number had been kept. Now, then, if you put them in the classified service, how are you going to get rid of them? They are temporary clerks; and if you put them in the classified service, you will have to find work for them or pass a law to reduce the number.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I am not particularly enamored of the civil service; but I would like to have some assurance that the appointments of these men will not be made in a partisan way.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not think they have been made in a partisan sense. I can not say what proportion of Republicans or Democrats have been appointed under the Secretary of War; but I know a great many Democrats are employed on the temporary roll, and I know they are being dropped as they can be disposed of from day to day and month to month. The roll is being lessened all the while and no new men put on; but if an emergency should come up owing to the situation in the Philippine Islands, under this bill he can appoint them, and he ought to appoint them. Now you know the facts, and you can take one horn of the dilemma or the other. You have got to give him the right to get them through the civil service and do this work, or do this work as he has been doing it and take men from the outside.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. LENTZ. Do you know of any Democrats from any Northern State that have been appointed?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe that there is a very much larger number from your State than any other. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENTZ. I do not believe there is a Democrat from my State on that roll.

Mr. RIXEY. While I have no doubt the gentleman from Georgia has had a fair share of the appointments, what I am after is to get a fair share of the appointments for myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to say to the gentleman that if there is anything I can do for him at the War Department, it will be done.

Mr. RIXEY. With that assurance, I think I might very well withdraw my amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I desire to ask the gentleman now, as he has withdrawn his amendment—

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to test my friend in a direct way before I withdraw it.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Of the 42,000 that were put under the civil service by President Cleveland before he went out of office, how many were Republicans?

Mr. RIXEY. I can not tell you, and I do not think you can.

Mr. HULL. My understanding is there was none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say candidly to my friend that I was informed by the officials that the question of Democracy or Republicanism or Populism had not entered into consideration in the appointments of these temporary clerks. This I do know, there are a good many Democrats there.

Mr. RIXEY. It seems to me perfectly fair to all parties that, as we have a law regulating these appointments, it should be followed. I do not see any reason why we should make an exception in this case and place $150,000 under the control of any member of the Government, to be used in making appointments as he sees proper. I say it is perfectly natural that the Secretary of War, a Republican, in a Republican Administration, with $150,000 with which he can give employment, should give the preference to people of his own political party.

I should say here the Democratic party would do the same thing. I do not believe that the Secretary of War in making these appointments will make them irrespective of their political preferences. If my friend wants to do away with the civil-service law, I may be with him; and if he can give me assurances upon which I can rely that political views will make no difference in the selection of these clerks I will be satisfied.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is not in order. I think we passed that provision and I think my point of order is good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois that when the gentleman from Virginia says that he was on his feet ready to take the point of order the Chair does not feel disposed to take advantage of the fact that two or three lines beyond that were read.

Mr. CANNON. Does the Chair hold that it is in time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is disposed to hold that the amendment was offered in time.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the easiest way is to vote on it, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his point of order?

Mr. CANNON. No; I understood the Chair to overrule the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overruled the portion that related to the time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON. That changes existing law, Mr. Chairman, beyond question. The object of this legislation—and it is already the law that persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation, or to be transferred from any position in the classified service to a position made thereunder. Now, that law was enacted a year ago, and enacted under legislative and executive appropriation, in connection with the appropriation for this identical temporary force. The object of the enactment of that law we have repeated here was to cure an abuse that existed in the Department, namely, that from this temporary appropriation, that was intended to be temporary in its nature to meet the war exigencies, the Department had in many cases transferred $1,200, $1,400, and $1,600 clerks in the classified service under this rule and promoted them. Now, then, it was the sense of Congress at that time to cure that abuse; and this legislation, in these identical words, was had during the last session of Congress in connection with this temporary force. Now we come to make a deficiency appropriation for this temporary force containing the law as it is, still keeping it out of the power to make this detail from the classified service. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted it changes the law, and you can go on and detail from that classified service $1,200 clerks and promote them to $1,800 clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if, in his judgment, without the insertion of these lines in the paragraph, that would be the law?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly; these lines but repeat the law that was enacted last winter, and the striking out of these lines and inserting the gentleman's provision changes the law. It strikes out existing law and introduces a new provision.

Mr. RIXEY. Why, in the paragraph providing for this appropriation, do you insert the latter part of the paragraph at all?

Mr. CANNON. Out of abundant caution we repeat the parent law. It is often done, and in fact it is done all through this bill, in almost every item.

Mr. RIXEY. The amendment that I propose states that this appropriation for the employment shall be in compliance with existing law. How can you contend that a provision of that kind is contradictory of existing law and changes existing law?

Mr. CANNON. It repeals existing law.

Mr. RIXEY. I can not see how that is when it is in compliance with existing law.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman strikes out these lines and his provision is inserted, then the evil is possible that Congress attempted to remedy at the last session.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the ground that this is simply a reenactment of existing law, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, reads as follows:
Vicksburg National Military Park: For such engineering and topographical work in connection with the Vicksburg National Military Park as may be proper and necessary, and for the payment of salaries and clerical expenses and such other incidental expenses as are provided for in the act of February 21, 1899, to remain available until expended: Provided, That the sum of $5,000, or so much of said amount as may be necessary, may be expended, with the approval of the Secretary of War, in the purchase of lands to be used as a part of the site of said park, $20,000.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, in line 10, after the word "war," insert "in addition to the amount authorized by section 1 of the act approved February 21, 1899."

Mr. COUSINS. I think that will commend itself to the judgment of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I will say that this embodies beyond question what the committee intended to report. I think it does not change it, but there can be no question about it with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.
The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction of balloon house and administration and instruction building at the Signal Corps post, at Fort Myer, Va., $18,500.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if this is not new legislation?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. You mean in reference to Fort Myer?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. No; it is not.

Mr. LLOYD. It provides for the construction of a balloon house. Is there any balloon house there now?

Mr. CANNON. No; but there is a fort there.

Mr. LLOYD. Is there any balloon house authorized by law at the present time?

Mr. CANNON. This is a public work in progress.

Mr. LLOYD. I understood you that there was no balloon house there.

Mr. CANNON. But the fort is there; the barracks and quarters are there. The signal office is there, and this is a mere incident to enable the Signal Service to properly conduct its educational work. We had a very full hearing about it. But the rule does not require, under conditions of that kind, and estimates, that there should be separate legislative action before you can build an outhouse or before you can construct a building as an incident to the work.

Mr. LLOYD. I should like to inquire what is the necessity for this expenditure?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the necessity for the expenditure is stated at length in the hearings. It is this: The Signal Service, since the commencement of the war with Spain, has very greatly increased, and it is almost impossible to get efficient signal-service men or minor officers except as they are enlisted and educated. For instance, take telegraph operators and the various signal-service men. They command better salaries elsewhere, and it has been found necessary, here at Fort Myer, to concentrate the enlisted men and let them go into a school of instruction. That covers ballooning, it covers telegraphy, it covers the code of signals, and many other things that I do not know about.

Mr. LLOYD. Is ballooning taught in any other place in the military department?

Mr. CANNON. No; they formerly taught it somewhat at the Presidio, and perhaps at some other point, but it has been concentrated at Fort Myer.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it so urgently necessary that we teach ballooning in the military establishment of the United States Government that upon an urgent deficiency bill we should make an appropriation of $18,500 for it?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, this is an urgent deficiency bill. It is wider than that. It is a bill for the public service, substantially, for the remainder of this fiscal year, and has gathered many items into it that are not urgent, some which might wait, but all necessary during the fiscal year. But as to this particular item, the sooner the appropriation is made the sooner the necessary improvement will be made.

Mr. LLOYD. I understood the distinguished gentleman, with reference to the amendment that was sought to be offered by which the post-office building in Kansas City might be completed, to object on the ground that it was new legislation. It seems to me certainly that was nothing like as new legislation as this would be.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that the distinction is right here, so that I think my friend will see it at once: In the case of Kansas City, the law that authorized the erection of a public building there expressly provided that it should not exceed a certain limit of cost. Now, all the money within that limit has been appropriated. The law in reference to Fort Myer, the Presidio, Fortress Monroe, and other military posts in the United States, did not fix a limitation, and can not, in the nature of things, fix a limitation, and they are public works that come within clause 2 of Rule XXI, relating to works in progress.

Mr. LLOYD. Is not this the distinction: At Kansas City there was an appropriation made for a post-office building, and the amount appropriated has been expended; here it is sought to create a new enterprise, to build a balloon house and to teach a system of ballooning, which has not been taught under the United States Government?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. LLOYD. One is an appropriation in aid of an enterprise upon which money has been expended, the other is to make an appropriation, as I understand it, for something that has never been undertaken and is entirely a new enterprise.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. I will state it again. At Kansas City there was a certain limit, and that limit is exhausted.

Mr. LLOYD. In this case there is no limit.

Mr. CANNON. Under the law here there is no limit. It is a public work in progress, and the appropriation is, in my judgment and in the judgment of your committee, in order, it being a public work in progress and part and parcel of the military establishment. But if the gentleman desires to make the point of order against it, I hope he will make it and let the Chair pass upon it.

Mr. LLOYD. I am not disposed to make the point of order, but I am merely calling attention to the fact that here you are undertaking an entirely new enterprise, when objection was made in the case of the Kansas City post-office to an enterprise already under way and necessary to be constructed.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, the evidence shows that they have got $15,000 worth of balloons over there at Fort Myer, and that this school of instruction is established. Now, I am quite content to let the committee pass upon the criticism of the gentleman. I hope the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of enlisted men, $3,000,197,140.

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. CANNON. In line 10, page 15?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, during my absence from the House this afternoon I am informed that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] sent to the Clerk's desk and had read a part of an editorial from the Greenville, S. C., Daily News of Thursday, January 11, 1900, criticising the New York Journal, the New York World, and myself regarding the investigation of Secretary Lyman J. Gage, of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, how much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. SULZER. Only a moment or two.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have not to exceed five minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor and it will only take a moment or two.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's discussion is out of order. Therefore, as I gave notice that I would enforce the rule, I acknowledge the equity of the gentleman having an opportunity to reply and I hope there will be unanimous consent.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I hear no objection. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from New York have five minutes. Is their objection? There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. I have read over the part of the editorial which has been put in the RECORD, and in justice to myself I want to say a few words in regard to it.

During the time that I have been a member of this House I have never sent to the Clerk's desk a newspaper clipping criticising a colleague, and I hope I never will. Whatever I have to say I have the courage to say myself and on my own responsibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] did not have the courage to say on his own responsibility what this editorial alleges. He took a mean advantage to hide himself behind a newspaper clipping. The article is written by an entire stranger to me. I never saw him; I do not know him; I never heard of him, and, so far as I know, I never did him an injury in my life.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that my public acts and my public utterances are the subject of legitimate criticism by the newspapers of this country. I have made it a rule of my life never to deny anything about myself that appears in the newspapers, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent. Life is too short to do so, and a newspaper lies so fast that the truth seldom overtakes it, and if it does it is too late to do any good.

I am informed by a colleague that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], when he sent this editorial to the desk, made the deliberate assertion that it was from a Democratic newspaper and that the editor was a Democrat. I am informed by my colleague from South Carolina that the Greenville Daily News is not a Democratic newspaper and that the editor is not a Democrat. From the tone of the editorial it would seem to me that the man who wrote it is a Republican of the Hanna stripe.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. He was a Democrat before he sold out.

Mr. SULZER. Yes, I am informed so. And his abuse of me is the very best praise I can have for doing my duty and telling the truth about the iniquity of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am informed that the editor and his newspaper supported the Republican party in 1896, and that he has been vociferously shouting for the Republican party ever since. That contemptible editorial would seem to bear this out. Prior to 1896, I am informed and believe, the editor and his newspaper were Democratic, but in that memorable year it is said the editor sold his political principles and political convictions for a mess of pottage to MARK HANNA, and his paper is now and ever since has been a Hannaized and a subsidized sheet. The paper is now employed, it is said, by HANNA and other Republicans to abuse loyal, honest, and conscientious Democrats.

Let me say right here that this abuse of me is very high praise, coming from the source it does. I have the courage to do my duty, and will continue to do it and to tell the truth about the iniquity of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will do this to the best of my ability, notwithstanding slandorous and hypocritical criticisms from subsidized sheets in the interests of MARK HANNA and the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am a Democrat, and I stand by my party. I believe in its principles and will do my best to voice them and to vindicate them. I have the courage of my political convictions and dare to express them. I know that the Republicans hate me for telling the truth, and I know that I am abused all over the country—ridiculed and maligned—because I dare to stand up here and in the city of New York, in the very heart of plutocracy, and tell the truth regarding great financial and economic questions.

HANNA and his cohorts, however, with all their power and with all their money, have not been able to defeat me. My constituents know me and they believe in me. They elected me five times to the legislature of my State, and they have elected me three times to Congress, and every time by an increased majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1894 I carried my district by a little over 800 majority. In 1896 I carried it by over 1,800 majority, and in 1898 I carried it by over 8,000 majority [loud applause on the Democratic side], and ran over 3,000 votes ahead of the ticket. The record speaks for itself, and is the people's commendation of my public career. The editorial is beneath my contempt, and I will not dignify it by talking about it or myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Just a few moments more. Let me say now that I shall continue to do my duty as I see it, and tell the truth regarding matters of public moment. MARK HANNA and his hirelings, the agents of the trusts, and the plutocrats can not frighten me, can not intimidate me, and can not prevent me from voicing the sentiments of the people; and I know the people pay very little attention to ridiculous and scurrilous articles written about public men by insignificant and irresponsible persons. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have no controversy with the man who wrote the article. He is entitled to his opinion of me. My controversy is with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I believe he will regret the action he has taken to-day. When he deliberately declared the newspaper and the editor belonged to the Democratic party he stated what was not true. I say here and now, on information given me by Representatives from South Carolina, that that statement is absolutely untrue, and if the gentleman had taken the trouble to inform himself about it he would not have made the reckless statement he did. He should be more careful hereafter.

The editorial also reflects on the New York Journal and the New York World. They are great newspapers, conducted in the interest of the people, and they will and can take care of themselves. They need no eulogy from me or any other man. Let me say, however, that MARK HANNA and the Republican party never had money enough, and never will have money enough, to buy them, or either of them. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

And you will find both of them supporting the Democratic party and the Democratic candidate for President in the next political contest. They stand for the common weal, they fight the battle of the plain people, and they can not be intimidated or swerved from the path of duty. In the interest of truth and publicity they will unearth the scandals of the Treasury Department and expose to the world Republican iniquity in high places, notwithstanding the Greenville News or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a single word. If that speech is not good for the nomination for the Vice-Presidency of you Democrats, then you are a very ungrateful set. [General laughter.] I hope the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops when moving either by land or water, and including also the transportation of recruits and recruiting parties heretofore paid from the appropriation for "Expenses for recruiting;" of supplies to the militia furnished by the War Department; of the necessary agents and employees; of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and other quartermaster stores, from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and subsistence stores from the places of purchase, and from the places of delivery under contract to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferrages; the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other seagoing vessels and boats required for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters and other employees; transportation of funds of the Army; the expenses of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; for procuring water, and introducing the same to buildings, at such posts as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance, and for the disposal of sewage and drainage, and for constructing roads and wharves; including not exceeding $750,000 for transportation of Spanish prisoners held by the United States and by the insurgents in the Philippine Islands from those islands to Spain, as provided by the treaty of Paris; for the payment of Army transportations lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large, and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act, a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at the time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service, $30,750,000.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how much there is contained in this urgent deficiency bill in excess of the ordinary appropriations for military purposes?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to the gentleman, for transportation, which item we are now upon—

Mr. TERRY. The military department generally.

Mr. CANNON. I will get the gentleman the report in a moment. The report shows that there is reappropriated for the military establishment $45,752,000.

Mr. TERRY. In this bill?

Mr. CANNON. In this bill, reappropriated.

Mr. TERRY. How much is that over the usual appropriation as appropriated heretofore?

Mr. CANNON. Not nearly as much as we had a year ago.

Mr. TERRY. That was when we were engaged in a war authorized by Congress, and not one initiated and conducted without the direct approval of the representatives of the people.

Mr. CANNON. We had over a hundred million a year ago.

Mr. TERRY. That was to carry on a war that Congress authorized in favor of freedom for Cuba. Now I want to see how much we are to expend for the Administration war.

Mr. CANNON. The Army appropriation for the current year, in round numbers, reported and enacted under the lead of the Committee on Military Affairs, is $80,000,000. Now, then, this appropriation for the Army makes available $45,000,000 from balances heretofore appropriated, last year, and not expended. Now, if you will add $45,000,000 to the $80,000,000—

Mr. TERRY. That makes one hundred and twenty-odd millions—

Mr. CANNON. Yes; one hundred and twenty-five millions.

Mr. TERRY (continuing). To carry on this Administration and political war.

Mr. CANNON. Oh!

Mr. TERRY (continuing). Waged outside of the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh!

Mr. TERRY. I know that you say "No;" but the people of the country do not say "No."

Mr. CANNON. To support the Army, to uphold the flag, to enforce the law, to suppress insurrection. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what it is, and I will stake my individual political fortunes and those of my party upon the indorsement of the American people; and if you dare stake yours upon a repudiation of that policy, well, you can stake it and go on.

Mr. TERRY. I dare to say this, that in respect to this war that is now being waged, and whilst we deplore the way we got into it, my people are willing to support the flag. But they condemn the policy that put the flag there in a war of criminal aggression when it ought not to have been placed there in such a cause. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We condemn the policy that is forcing us into an un-American position in order to support the flag.

Let me tell you if Congress or this Administration would declare its policy, as it declared in the case of Cuba, the insurrectionists, as you call them, would lay down their arms in less than two weeks and end this criminal war. This is a criminal war and is going on because you did not declare what your policy and purposes were to be; and yet when you have entered upon such a partisan course you try to divert public attention by wrapping yourselves up in the flag and crying out about "patriotism," as you do every time you seek to depart from the fundamental principles of the American Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. One word only in reply. This bill appropriates $45,000,000 to sustain the Army for the balance of this fiscal year. If anybody wants to move to strike the appropriation out, here is the place and now is the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CANNON. Let me complete my sentence.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You have issued a challenge.

Mr. CANNON. Now is the time and here is the place. So far as disturbing the air is concerned, criticism and declamation that do not affect the legislation concern me but little. We used to have an old saying that the court decided, the judgment was entered, and the party that lost had one remedy—he could stand and swear at the court. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not desire upon this bill, at this time, under the five-minute rule, so far as I am concerned, to enter upon a discussion of the policy touching our outlying territory; there is a time to do that; but I stand ready to oppose any motion that comes from anywhere that will decrease this appropriation one cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I interrupt the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I presume that there is not an American citizen anywhere, upon either side of this Chamber or outside of this Chamber, who is worthy of mention as an American citizen, who wants to be disloyal to the flag or to the cause of his country in war. The gentleman from Illinois, with his accustomed shrewdness and cunning, has uttered a challenge which he knows will not be accepted, because he knows that there is not a man on the Democratic side of this Chamber, however violently opposed to the present imperialistic policy of the Administration, who will undertake to weaken the arm of an American soldier while he is fighting, whether the foe is right or whether the foe is wrong, whether the foe is fighting for liberty in reality or for liberty in imagination. I believe that these people out there in the Philippines are fighting for liberty in reality; but when my country declares war and I am called upon to line myself up upon the one side or the other, I have never yet proposed to decrease the amount of money, the number of guns, or the number of soldiers that are necessary to carry out that policy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me go a step further. The gentleman from Illinois has uttered his challenge safely, because with his accustomed shrewdness and cunning he has put it on a safe ground. I am tired, in the words of Professor McLaughlin, of Chicago, a time-honored Republican, I believe—I am tired of the miserable subterfuges whereby it is attempted to confuse loyalty to the flag with loyalty to a policy that disgraces the flag. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if it were once uttered as a fundamental principle of patriotism that no man could remain a patriot and at the same time oppose the methods of the Administration, either in inaugurating or carrying on war, what then would become of civilization? What of humanity? What would become, sir, of the Government that we have attempted to establish in this country? What would become of Burke, of Chatham, and all the great men who never refused to vote supplies for the British army while it was attempting to subjugate our ancestors, but who did stand in the House of Commons day after day and night after night and enter their protests within the nation, but not outside of it, against the policy which was carrying the nation's flag in a wrong cause?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, this world is an old world and it has an old history, a history that repeats itself all the time, and the history of all the nations is summed up in one sentence, as some great man, whose name I have forgotten, has said, "First liberty, then glory, then splendor, then corruption, and then decay, and barbarism at last."

Mr. BELL and other members. Byron.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I fear we have a people who are forgetting that a free country, the Government of a free people, was established for the purpose of rendering the individual citizen free and happy, and beginning to believe that government was established for the purpose of rendering the Government itself splendid or the flag glorious. Such a people are upon the very first rung of the ladder in their descent, and I defy the gentleman from Illinois and I defy anybody within the length and breadth of the United States to pursue the history of any people anywhere who have started out with devotion to liberty and have wound up with devotion to glory that have not gone down to death and barbarism.

There is a glory that is glory indeed. There is a glory of the flag that is glory indeed, and that is carrying it as the emblem of all that is precious, of all that is free, of all that is right, of all that is just. But there is a pseudo glory that is glory for the time being. Its advocates may seemingly press into the service for the time being those who do not believe in its ultimate results nor in its ultimate intents. But it is none the less a pseudo and a false glory, and that is the worship of the flag simply because it is a flag, because the flag is there, regardless of whether it ought to be there, regardless of whether the cause of liberty, humanity, civilization, justice, and righteousness demand that it should be there or not.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that in my opinion there will not be a vote upon this side against all the guns and all the men and all the ammunition that are needed, because, although we have terms to make with the Filipinos, terms, I hope, besides unconditional surrender, those terms are not to be made until peace is established. Just one word more. I do not intend to weary the House. I did not even intend to say what I am saying now; had not the remotest idea of it.

Some time ago I introduced some resolutions into this House, expressing at least my own opinion of what we ought to do, and in this one sentence I will round it out: First, accomplish peace. Before we do that, however, announce to the civilized world and to the Filipinos what our policy will be with regard to the Filipinos and their territory. This is my challenge, our challenge, to the gentleman from Illinois. I believe with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], that if we announce that policy we will have peace within two years. But do not execute that policy, do not consummate that policy, until peace is established. And then when peace is established, let the great American Republic—the great Republic of all the ages and of all the world—declare to these brown men, half clad and half civilized, this policy: "For a limited length of time we will stand by you while you learn how to stand up. At the expiration of that time we will leave you your liberty, your independence, your autonomy, provided only that you enter into treaty to do what is just and right by us in consideration of what we have accomplished for you, namely, this, your proposed liberty and independence." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will take a very brief time to say a word or two. I did not have any supposition that remarks of the kind that have been made were to be made. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] arose in his place while we were considering a money bill to provide for the support of the Army and proceeded to interrogate the gentleman in charge of the bill. I answered his question as well as I could. He then, in substance, said that this was money by the one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars to carry on a political war, if not a wicked war, etc.

And, as I am apt to do in the heat of conversation, having charge of the bill, I answered; and then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] comes and makes a splendid talk, as he always does, an absolute oration to liberty, to justice, to law, to order, and he refers to the rocks upon which ancient governments and civilizations have split, and all that kind of thing. It was done as well, I will say to my honored friend from Mississippi, as I ever heard anybody do it before in the House or out of the House. I want to compliment the gentleman.

But, after all said and done, what is this bill? It is a bill taking money from the Treasury to support the Army, which is used in the enforcing of law and the putting down of insurrection. What is the practical question? Shall the money be appropriated or not? That is the only practical question. If it is to be appropriated at all, then the sooner it is appropriated and the more directly it is expended to the end in view, with the least confusion of counsel, the better—the better for saving life, the better for the Filipinos, the better for the Americans, the better for the enforcement of law.

And pending that time the more of a unit we can be in voting this money, and the more of a unit we can be in supporting this policy—if we are to enforce law and order and to put down the insurrection, the more of a unit we can be the better. Now, that is all that I aim to say. But the gentleman says that with my cunning I have defied anybody to move to strike out a dollar of this appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Declare your policy. That is what we want.

Mr. CANNON. The policy, here and now, that I am addressing myself to is to appropriate the money to support the Army that will put down the insurrection. Now, if you are not for it, vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We are with you on that.

Mr. CANNON. If you are for it, vote for it. "But," says my friend, "some time or other, in the distant future, I expect to criticize the method in which these affairs have been carried on." And then he says we should declare a policy, and so on. Well, I have always found it safe, out in the Mississippi Valley, not to cross a stream until you come to it.

Therefore I am not here to say exactly what legislation shall be had in the future, when we come to make a civil establishment for the Philippine Islands, because, forsooth, the circumstances and conditions may change, so that the exact remedy, determined now for a year hence, or six months hence, or two years hence, might not be apt.

Now, one single word as to the propriety of saying by word in this great legislative body, or by word in the great metropolitan press, or by word in the great meetings throughout the country, that which will encourage the enemy. You all recollect that Aguinaldo during last fall, before the election, issued that proclamation asking his people to stand firm and resist the Army of the United States, because, he said, the election was coming on over there and there would be a reversal of policy.

Now, thank God, I never have said anything, while I was voting for the Army or otherwise, that authorized Aguinaldo to make such a proclamation as that. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Ordinarily I yield to my distinguished friend, but just at this moment I can not. Now, that is all I want to say. I have no desire to criticize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] nor the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. They are Representatives; they are of full age; they are answerable to their constituents. But when they criticize me, I must at least defend the measure that I have in hand, and I would have them with me, at least for the present, if I had supreme power, not only in voting for this bill, but in withholding counsel that would make $2 necessary to put down the insurrection in the Philippines instead of $1. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just exactly what Lord North said to Edmund Burke.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, but I will say to the gentleman I was not there at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But history was there, and history is eternal.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairing and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops, and for issue at the arsenals and depots, $30,000.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 3, page 26, the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of J. H. Wood, chairman of the general committee of the Thirty-fourth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held at Chicago next summer, two dismounted condemned cannon, used in the late civil war, to be used for the purpose of furnishing memorial badges commemorative of the holding of such encampment: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States for the delivery of said condemned cannon."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is the usual provision that is made from year to year with reference to the annual meeting of the Grand Army, and I am inclined, so far as I am concerned, to accept the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $150,000: Provided, That in administering the service under this appropriation no deficiency shall be created therein.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 39, line 6, by striking out the proviso in lines 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, as that is already the law, this does not change it. To save time, as I want to complete this bill to-night, so far as I am concerned, the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON. I have an amendment to offer to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 6, on page 39, the words "and fifty."

Mr. BENTON. I want it understood that in offering this amendment I am not opposed to rural free delivery. I am willing to vote all the money necessary for its maintenance. I am striking at a wrong that has been done with the money already appropriated by Congress. There was appropriated $300,000 at the last Congress for rural free delivery. After several months passed, establishing routes in some districts stopped, because the Assistant Postmaster-General said the appropriation was exhausted, and we find now that the Department has spent $25,000 more than was permissible for the half year of that time. It is argued by some gentlemen here that this appropriation is intended to be spent by the Postmaster-General as he pleases and that he could spend the whole sum in a month in experiment. That is not the language of the act under which it was appropriated. That act says:

Appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

What I claim is that the Post-Office Department, at the behest or request of members of Congress, has gone beyond the appropriation and has spent $25,000 more than they were authorized to spend for the six months. I say it is all right for men in Congress to importune the Department, but those in charge of rural free delivery should have told them, as I was told, that the money was exhausted and not have been persuaded to violate the law. The precedent is evil. Permit the executive officer to go beyond the authority granted by Congress and come in and ask for money to make up a deficiency and get it, and the door is opened for a repetition of the same thing. It is all right for Congressmen to beg for these routes to be established who want this rural free delivery. I am for rural delivery myself, but I say this question goes beyond that. It is fundamental that our executive officer should be bound by the specific appropriation, and whatever gentlemen on the other side may do, I say it is wrong to go beyond it.

I was sorry and surprised to find that the chairman of the committee, after condemning this policy as strongly as I did, closed up his speech with the declaration that he would vote for the bill notwithstanding he knew a wrong had been committed. What I want to call the attention of the House to is that we on this side of the House have always prided ourselves as being strict constructionists, both of the law and the Constitution; and I want to know whether Democrats are going to permit themselves to indorse the acts of any official in violation of law because such violation may benefit their districts?

This rural delivery depends upon a particular act of Congress. The life and virility of this rural delivery depends upon the specific act which appropriated the $300,000. You are asked to indorse the executive act of going beyond the amount permitted, and what I want to know is whether men on this side of the House, because they may be able to get an extra route, are going to indorse the action of the Department, which was openly and notoriously in violation of law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is not the situation: Routes have been organized which, unless this appropriation is continued, will be suspended?

Mr. BENTON. Yes; it would suspend those established within the last few weeks. I know the claim has been made here a half a dozen times that it would suspend them all, but it is not true. I know there is a clamor for these free-delivery routes, but I shall insist on this question being voted upon, so that Democrats who want to vote according to law can stand up, and those who want to be counted as violating the law can have the opportunity.

It is an unfair construction of the law to say that the Post-Office Department could have expended the whole sum in six months or in one month. This appropriation was for the whole fiscal year. When the half of the sum appropriated was exhausted in the half year, other members should have been told, as I was, that no more money was available till appropriated. Then the Department could come to Congress and say, "We need $150,000 to establish and maintain new routes for the remainder of the fiscal year." Under the Constitution Congress is invested with the power to appropriate money, and not executive officers. If the Department can exceed its authority in the sum of $50,000, then it can do so a million of dollars. People whom I have the honor to represent want these routes, but they do not want them without authority of law.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 39, by striking out, in lines 5 and 6, the word "one" and inserting the word "two," so as to make it read "$200,000."

Mr. LENTZ. The gentleman from Missouri proposes to strike out the $50,000, and I desire to strike out the "fifty," and change the "one" to "two."

Mr. CANNON. May I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that we vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri first?

Mr. LENTZ. I am willing to vote down this amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. I think we have not got enough money in there, and I want to say so. I am willing to withhold my amendment until this amendment is voted on. I think this reduction ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENTZ. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew the offer of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "one" and the words "and fifty" and insert in place of the word "one" the word "two," so as to read "$200,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 6, page 39, add the following language: "Such service shall be justly and equally apportioned among the several States and Territories."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think that is subject to a point of order, and while I would not make it, I want to finish the bill to-night and I am compelled to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to strike out the last word. The Fifty-third Congress began the work of preparing appropriations for experimental village free delivery. Upon that subject my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] outlined the history of legislation this morning.

The Fifty-third Congress made an appropriation of $10,000 for rural free delivery. Now, village free delivery never amounted to anything and never will, for the simple reason that the people who live in the villages are within ten minutes' walk of their mail all the time. The Fifty-third Congress went further. I had something to do with that, because it happened that I had seen, in many countries of the world much less densely populated than Mississippi is, the mail being delivered along to the boxes upon the mail routes. The Fifty-third Congress voted $10,000, but left its expenditure discretionary with the Postmaster-General. Postmaster-General Bissell expressed the opinion that there was more politics than postal service in that particular appropriation and absolutely declined to exercise the discretion with which Congress had vested him. After that a cohort of gentlemen here interested in the question, with whom I am proud to number myself as one, made an appropriation and made it mandatory.

Notwithstanding the mandatory provision, the Postmaster-General still refused to exercise the power vested in him at that time. Later on, under Mr. Wilson, who became Postmaster-General, this service began to grow a little bit. He began to be told about what was possible and about what had been accomplished elsewhere. I myself wrote to him a letter, which is upon file there now, telling him what I knew about free delivery elsewhere, and about the evolution of free delivery without governmental aid in a part of my own district.

Later on the postmaster took hold of it, and I want to congratulate the House to-day—and that is the purpose for which I rose—upon the fact that with this small beginning we have arrived now at the present proportions of this appropriation and at the present proportions of this public service; and to express the hope that my friends upon both sides of this Chamber who are interested in the ultimate welfare of this service, a service which in my opinion is of the utmost importance to the farming communities, not only on account of their commerce, not only on account of their social letters, but as a great educational provision, superior in my opinion to the facilities that could be furnished by any university in the United States, merely as an educational matter—I wish to express the hope that they will let this clause of this bill, just as it is, go through the House, and that later on, when we come to make an appropriation for the next fiscal year, we may remember the lessons of progress which we have learned, and that we may especially remember the magnificent lessons which are included in this rural free-delivery report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, fully illustrated, fully explained in every respect; that we may not encumber this bill with our efforts to further the service, but that we may remember what has been accomplished, what has been successfully experimented with and brought to a point where it is no longer a matter of expense; and then, when we come to the appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, that we may remember that the rural communities of this country, the farmers of this country, who pay a great part of the taxes, who are over half of the population of this country, who are expected to furnish the main material in time of war, are entitled to something under our Administration. And I hope that when the time comes we may appropriate $1,000,000 to this purpose, while we are appropriating millions to little buildings in large cities. [Applause.] We appropriated $3,000,000 here not long ago for one building in one city, and yet I find men who do not want to appropriate $1,000,000 to allow the farmers of this country to have rural free delivery.

Mr. MERCER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, it will increase the vote in Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Chairman, if education would increase the Republican vote, this would increase it; but my historical recollection is that any educational qualification always decreases the Republican vote in Mississippi. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MERCER. Something is the matter with it, I know.

Mr. CANNON. Now I hope the Clerk may be permitted to read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 13, and to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 12, and to offer an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 12, after line 4, insert:

"For payment of the expenses connected with the investigation of the claims of the members of the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry, including pay of clerk, stenographer, cost of printing, advertising, and stationery, traveling and hotel expenses, expenses of witnesses, and all other incidental expenses actually and necessarily incurred under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 27, 1899, for the relief of the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. CANNON, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendments? If not, they will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk and to ask a re-reference of the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent to change the reference of a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4470) granting pensions to certain officers and enlisted men of the Life-Saving Service and to their widows and minor children.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reference of this bill will be changed to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEETING AT 1 O'CLOCK TO-MORROW.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on each side of the Chamber have suggested that they desire to attend the exercises to-morrow connected with the unveiling of the Webster statue. This will necessarily take till 12 o'clock or later, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts is hereby granted leave to sit during the sessions of the House during the present Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 1 o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. QUARLES introduced a bill (S. 2545) granting a pension to Nellie A. West; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2546) to remove the charge of desertion against Philip Pflueger, late of Company G, Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2547) granting an increase of pension to Michael Dillon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2548) to provide for the inspection and treatment of trees, plants, buds, cuttings, grafts, scions, nursery stock, and fruit imported into the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2549) granting a pension to Sayer Jensen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a bill (S. 2550) granting a pension to C. W. Hobart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2551) for the establishment of an inebriate asylum in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 2552) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Overby Williams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALIAFERRO introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 70) diverting and setting apart $50,000 out of the sums heretofore appropriated for jetty work at Cumberland Sound, in the States of Florida and Georgia, for sluicing and dredging at the entrance of said sound; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $200 to be used in the Treasury bindery for material for binding important written records, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation not exceeding $10,000 for condemnation of land for the extension of Massachusetts avenue across the valley of Rock Creek and to provide footings for the embankments which may be necessary in connection therewith, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVE OF THE TRANSVAAL.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate if any person has been accredited representative in any capacity to the United States of America by the South African Republic, commonly known as the Transvaal, and if such person was officially accepted and recognized as such representative by the Government of the United States, and if he was not, for what reason official acceptance and recognition were refused him; and the Secretary of State is further directed to inform the Senate of the name of such person, and when he applied for official recognition, and when and for what reason official recognition was refused him, and if any other government, and, if so, what government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative of said South African or Transvaal Republic by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the resolution be printed and go over in the usual course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule the resolution goes over.

OUTLYING DEPENDENCIES.

Mr. ROSS. I offer a resolution which I ask may lie on the table subject to call, and I give notice that I shall ask unanimous consent at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Tuesday next to call up the resolution and make it the occasion of some remarks.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the provisions of the Constitution do not, unaided by act of Congress, extend over Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands.

That by the recent treaty with Spain the United States takes the sovereignty over Puerto Rico and over the Philippine Islands under the duty to use and exercise it for the general welfare and highest interest of the people of the United States and the inhabitants of the islands, unrestrained by the provisions of the Constitution, and over Cuba under the duty to exercise it for the pacification of the island.

That the successful discharge of this duty demands the establishment of a separate department of government to take charge of all outlying dependencies of the United States and the passage of a general law making appointments therein nonpolitical.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the resolution may lie on the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CALIFORNIA STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1798) entitled "A bill referring to the Court of Claims certain claims arising in California in the years 1846 and 1848," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1867; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of said act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,800 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day when I introduced Senate joint resolution No. 65 that to-day I would ask the privilege of addressing the Senate upon it. I now ask leave to call up the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 65) declaring the purpose of the Government of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. WELLINGTON on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the Government of the United States does not consider the payment of the $20,000,000 to the Government of the Kingdom of Spain, stipulated by the treaty of Paris and made in accordance with the same, as a purchase either of lands, persons, or privileges of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, but that such payment was made with the friendly purpose of abrogating any claim of sovereignty that was then lodged in the Spanish Government, and to prevent the intervention of other foreign powers in Philippine affairs.

Second. That it is not the purpose of the Government or the people of the United States to deprive the people of the Philippine Islands of their right of self-government, and the war now being waged is not for conquest or for the permanent possession of the islands, but for the establishment of law and order, and shall cease when the Filipinos now under arms make overtures for peace upon the condition that after the establishment of law and order the people of the islands, or such islands as may desire, shall have the privilege, under the protection of the United States, of establishing a republic in which the principle of "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people" shall be absolutely preserved—

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for trespassing upon its time. I have long hesitated, and even now enter upon this discussion with reluctance and regret; but I feel my justification lies in the importance of the question which has been forced to the front and may well become the greatest issue now engaging the attention of our people.

The trend of events for several months past has led me to believe that some of the leaders of the Republican party are about to commit themselves to a new departure in the foreign policy of the Government. This feeling has been strengthened by the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Indiana and the very eloquent but radical speech which he made advocating it in this Chamber some days ago. The extreme position he assumed seemed to meet with favorable response, and the plaudits of Administration Senators indicated that perhaps it echoed the sentiment felt in other important circles. If that be true, and the Republican party, through the Administration, is about to pledge itself to the policy therein outlined, I deem it a duty which I owe to myself and the party which I have served, as well as to my country, to sound a note of warning that it would be well to consider carefully, not in the forum of the passions, but before the calm judgment seat of reason, present conditions and future possibilities, before embarking on an unknown sea upon a voyage of discovery which will perhaps bring us nothing better than national tribulation.

I for one am not ready to enter upon a policy of expansion, the first exemplification of which is to be the taking, by force of arms, of the lands, persons, and privileges of the Philippine Islanders.

One of the phrases which seems to have a pleasant sound to many of our friends is that of "the imperial destiny of the Republic." Such phrases and the pictures they form in the imagination are exceeding beautiful, and act as a blandishment which would lead us to the path they point to. To my mind, however, the Republic can not have an imperial destiny. Imperial destiny, surrounded by all the panoply of war, of wealth and power, can not wander hand in hand upon the same highway with the simplicity of a Republic such as ours. One must be sacrificed to the other. For myself, I would choose the latter.

History, as we unroll the canvas upon which the memorable events she records are painted in ineffaceable colors, shows us that along the pathway of nations are the wrecks of many republics who sought imperial destiny.

The republics of Greece were strong until they surrendered to kingly power and allowed the son of Philip to consolidate them for the purpose of invading the Persian Empire. In the glory of the victories of Alexander came imperial destiny, but with it the extinction of Greek liberty and the beginning of the decadence of the power of the republics.

The same story will be found upon the pages of Roman history. Rome, having grown strong and powerful as a republic, listened to the voice which spoke of conquest, of extension of power, and expansion of territory. Caesar came, and the world bowed its neck to the Roman arms; but in the hour of its greatest glory came also the first note to the Roman citizen of the loss of his greatest privilege, for no nation ever yet robbed a weaker people of its right of self-government that in the end fate or Providence did not cause the blow to rebound and strike the perpetrator of the outrage. Rome lost its liberty because it had deprived other nations of their freedom and right of self-government.

These, it may be said, are ancient precedents and have often been cited. Let us look upon modern examples. There is not before us to-day one upon which we can look and gain greater knowledge, by the experience that has come to that nation, than upon the Kingdom of Spain. When, under the patronage of Spain, the Genoese navigator discovered America, the Spanish Kingdom was perhaps the most powerful in Europe. It dictated the policy of the Continent when it stood in league with imperial Germany, and often outweighed the latter in importance. Then came colonial expansion; the adventurous spirit of the nation sought all parts of the world, the Western Hemisphere as well as the Orient, and every exertion was made to enlarge the area of dominion, the wealth of the nation, and the power of the monarchy by incorporating all the ends of the earth. And why? Did they not, too, say when they began this policy that it was to give the benefits of Christian civilization to the savages of the Orient and the Occident? And yet when the religion of the Cross was brought, the same hand that gave it also inflicted serfdom and slavery under the guise and form of colonial government, which sought not the good of the native, but the aggrandizement of Spanish power and the enrichment of the Spanish people.

Four centuries of this policy have passed, and what has been the result? The last vestige of Spain's important colonial possessions has passed from her; and notwithstanding the fact that she has robbed every people she had under her sway by exactions the most brutal and government the most tyrannical ever known among civilized men, to-day her nobility is impoverished, her peasantry is ignorant and helpless, and the Spanish nation, sapped of its vital energy by its own cruelty, has become so poor that no nation in Europe will bow to do it honor. Her internal resources have been neglected until now there is neither energy nor intelligence to develop them.

And what of the Republic of France? France has her colonial possessions; she has lost many of them, but the remaining portions of her empire have given occasion for an army that sought to conquer the world and has dragged France from the lofty place it once held until now, though this army is the chief power, it has become so corrupt that even the partisans of the French Republic can not defend it, and the nation struggles in fierce effort to escape the baneful influence that threatens decadence and decay.

Germany, which within the last four decades has advanced with giant stride in civil and martial strength, rebuilding the structure of a regenerated empire upon ancient foundations, not content with her phenomenal success at home, has joined in the mad march of the nations to far-off climes for the purpose of creating a vast system of colonial possessions. Her venture has only begun, yet even now she is sacrificing the flower of her peasant youth, and many of all classes find destruction under the burning sun of the Torrid Zone in the vain chase for evanescent power.

But perhaps the greatest example of colonial possessions and power is that of England. It is often pointed to as the one great exemplar in the endeavor to establish the doctrine that colonies can be used to advantage. Unquestionably, England presents the most favorable picture, and yet when you scrutinize it carefully you find the colonial policy of England has been and will be a positive disadvantage to that country. I believe that one of the greatest blessings that ever came to England was the loss of the American colonies, which became, during the Revolution and are now, the United States of America.

I believe, further, that the darkest pages of her history are those which record her transaction with her colonies of the Indian empire. I would not have my country accumulate wealth and power by the government of possessions upon the same plane and in the same manner that England governed India under the East India Company, for it is beyond question that when Hastings and his compeers were sent to India to administer affairs there, bringing in their train famine, mutiny, destruction, and death, it was not for the purpose of civilization; it was not to Christianize, but it was to press from those unfortunate people all the wealth and the richness and the gold and the jewels that could be gathered. It made no difference how they were procured, so that they were brought to the coffers of England's great company.

And what has been the result? The spirit of colonization has grown, the energies of England have been concentrated upon foreign lands. For half a century almost she has been directing her army against the barbarous inhabitants of Africa and Asia. She has not met the Caucasian race since the Crimean war, and now, when for the first time for half a century she attempts to send her armies to destroy a brave and courageous people, she all at once rudely awakens from the dream of her power, because she finds that corruption has eaten to her very vitals, and her army, which she deemed was still like that of Cromwell, invincible, has been belabored and defeated every day since they attacked the Boers. And, sir, justly so. And it may be at no distant time when the insidious influences which have thus debased her will entirely destroy the weighty structure of empire she has erected.

But, sir, whatever may have been the experience of other nations, our own Government is founded upon a different principle from that of either Spain, France, Germany, or England, which have been cited as examples.

Abraham Lincoln, simple, wise, great, and good as he was, justly described the intention of the fathers of the Republic when he said that "a new nation had been founded upon this continent, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," and further that ours is "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

From the time when the Declaration of Independence emanated from the City of Brotherly Love to the beginning of the Spanish-American war there had never been an hour when all the might and power and influence of this country were not dedicated to liberty and self-government.

The American people, in the immortal Declaration, asserted with the positiveness of what they considered "a self-evident truth" that "all men are endowed by their Creator with inherent and inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." This Declaration was written by Jefferson, inspired by Franklin, cordially indorsed by Washington, Adams, and Hamilton. And, sir, if the propositions advanced in 1776 were true then and applicable to the American people struggling for freedom, have they grown less forceful by the passage of a century and a quarter of time? And are they less applicable now to a struggling people in the year 1900, even though they dwell in the distance and are weak beginners in the contention for national life and the establishment of a government by their own consent, so long denied them by the tyranny of Spain? If it was a truth then it is a truth now. It has never until now been controverted by Americans. The whole course of their national life has been favorable to the practical application of the principle thus asserted by the founders of the Union. The aspiration of our people has been to have the heaven of liberty rise and spread to the "utmost ends of the earth." The flag of our country has to the present never waved but as the ensign of freedom. Three things there are that appeal with greatest force to the heart and spirit of Americans: The holy altar of our religion, the sacred circle of our home, the silent language of our flag. The latter is the most powerful, for the altar of religion is deserted, the circle of home is broken that Americans, heeding the appeal of their flag, might march to battle and to death for the preservation of the liberties and franchises of their native land.

Our banner was the ensign of Washington when he achieved independence. It was borne by Jackson when he preserved the liberty of the Union. It floated over the volunteers who fought for Texan freedom upon Mexican soil. It survived in the civil strife from which Lincoln emerged, bearing in the one hand the renewed charter of Federal government for a reunited people; in the other, the emancipation and enfranchisement of a race. It was carried by our Army as it stormed San Juan Hill for Cuban rights. It waves now in silent majesty over our great Republic. Its very existence is dedicated to liberty. Its history proclaims self-government and speaks of a continuous policy of encouragement and support of liberty-loving and aspiring peoples. In the language of President McKinley himself, "From Plymouth Rock to the Philippines the grand triumphant march of human liberty has never paused."

Shall it pause now? Shall the advancing columns of freedom-seeking men be retarded and obstructed? Shall we who have led the vanguard of the march turn upon our fellow-soldiers in the cause and bar the way when they would reach the same vantage ground we occupy and turn them back? Shall there be a reversal of that policy now, and shall we in the future, demanding for ourselves freedom, deprive others of that great boon because we stand a giant of strength and they are weaklings before us? If it is our purpose to discard the doctrines of government under which we have prospered and grown great, would it not be well to ponder and carefully consider by the light of the past as it illumines the narrow strip of the present and gives a fitful gleam into the future? For it is only by comparing the events of the present with the recollections of the past that we may foreshadow and fashion the future.

Will we not sacrifice more in the end than we gain? This is a selfish proposition, and yet even upon this, to my mind, we should hesitate before abandoning our past record and adopting a new code of national honor.

In the resolution I have offered I clearly indicate the purpose I have in view. It is not to abandon the present war until certain conditions have been reached, but to endeavor the attainment of these conditions as quickly as possible, and then give to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands an opportunity of creating for themselves, as we did in Revolutionary times, by evolution and self-exertion, the best government possible for their condition.

I deem it an unfortunate situation that we are compelled to be at war in the Orient; and had the note of warning which I gave nearly two years ago in this Chamber been heeded, there would be no necessity for either the blood or the treasure that must be there expended. I trust the Senate will bear with me as I take a brief retrospect of the intervening time. Upon the occasion to which I allude I stood here, the only Senator upon the Republican side of the Chamber who ventured to oppose the tide of public opinion and voice the deep conviction that the war which was about to be declared against the Spanish Kingdom was unnecessary, and therefore unjust. I felt then, and I have the same faith now, that every contention made by our Government could have been accomplished by peaceful means through diplomatic negotiations.

Up to the day when war was declared every demand made upon Spain had been acceded to, and there seemed to be but one thing more necessary, and that was that Spain should withdraw from Cuba; that the last vestige of her authority in the Western Hemisphere should depart, and that Cuba should have an opportunity of attaining that freedom for which she had so long struggled. But, sir, the feeble protest was not heard, or at least it was unheeded, and war came. It was brief, and the results were, so far as military and naval conditions go, splendid and glorious. I well remember that when I appealed that the war should not be, I further said that if my countrymen determined to make war they would find the conservative people of the State which I had the honor in part to represent in this body, though they were opposed to war, in the forefront of battle. The events which came justified that declaration, for, sir, that July morning which by its rising sun heralded the destruction of the Spanish naval power in Santiago Bay, as it illuminated the line of American warships advancing to deal death and destruction to the Spanish fleet, surrounded by a halo of glory the martial figure of a son of Maryland, Winfield Scott Schley, who guided and directed the great contest.

And though it now seems to be the policy of a cabal in one of the departments of this Administration to rob him of the glory which justly is his, the verdict of the American people has been recorded and he will go down to history as the true hero of that naval battle. By the force of that victory the Spanish power on the island was broken, the land forces no longer made resistance, and Cuba was practically freed from the domination of Spain. By the treaty of Paris, Spain in due time withdrew her troops, and America, by the very resolution upon which she entered upon war with Spain, was in honor bound to grant the right of self-government to the Cuban people. A year and a half has passed since the great battle; almost a year since the ratification of the treaty, and yet there is no indication that we intend to keep faith, but there is every indication that by the power of syndicates, cabals, and combinations there is to be continued in Cuba the despotism of a military government in which the Cubans themselves have no part, which is beyond the pale of any law save that of force, and is not recognized by our Constitution.

There was no doubt that we would be victorious, but in the very victories we were to win there were dangers that would in the end more than counterbalance the good accomplished. A very Pandora's box of national troubles has been opened, and difficulties and dangers are gradually taking form and surrounding us. In the Spanish-American war the island of Puerto Rico, almost without defense, was taken from Spain; the people made no objection. Even if there was to be only a change of masters, they deemed it would be better to escape Spanish maladministration. But, sir, from them now comes the cry for help, a Macedonian cry, which says, "You broke the bands that bound us to our former moorings, you destroyed the trade we had, you have left us hanging between sky and water in mid-ocean, and you have given us nothing in return."

But, sir, the great question, the absorbing topic that now confronts us as a result of this war, is the question of the Philippine Islands. In the far-off Orient, 10,000 miles from our capital, is the archipelago which demands our attention. We know but little of its history or present conditions. Our information concerning it is imperfect and limited. Of its geography we are so ignorant that even the publications of the Government can not tell us whether the islands are 800, or 1,200, or perhaps 1,600 in number. Regarding the population our knowledge is defective, it being variously estimated from eight to twelve millions. The inhabitants of the divers islands we know are of every shade of color, every degree of intelligence and civilization, ranging from the absolute barbarism of the Sulus to the refinement and culture of Aguinaldo and his compatriots. To assume absolute control of and permanently hold the archipelago would be a burdensome and thankless task. Our chief concern, however, is with larger islands, and as a type of these we may consider the island of Luzon, upon which is situated the city of Manila, the metropolis of the whole dependency.

When the Cubans were struggling for freedom the Filipinos were not idle; time and again they had attempted to throw off the Spanish yoke which imperfectly rested upon them, and when they saw their brethren in tribulation in the Caribbean Sea struggling for freedom, they, too, once more began the attempt to destroy their Spanish masters. When our war with Spain began these insurgents had gained advantages at different points in the islands, more especially upon the island of Luzon, where they had gradually gathered a large army and had taken one Spanish position after another until they were virtually in possession of the whole island, except the small territory occupied by the city of Manila and the range of country beyond it controlled by its guns. It is said, and I believe truthfully, that these insurgents had, before our fleet came to the harbor, erected a cordon of intrenchments that had gradually moved in juxtaposition to the city of Manila, reaching from water to water, and it appeared to be only a matter of time when the last citadel of Spanish power upon the island would fall into the hands of these people.

At this point the Spanish-American war began, and it became the purpose of the President to strike Spain wherever vulnerable, and therefore it was that our fleet in the Orient, under the command of Admiral Dewey, was ordered by the President to proceed to Manila, there intercept the Spanish fleet in eastern waters and, if possible, destroy it. It is a matter of history that the American fleet carried out its instructions and that upon the May morning in Manila Bay attained a glorious and almost bloodless victory for American arms, annihilated the Spanish fleet, and in its annihilation brought about an entire destruction of Spanish law and authority in the Philippines. It now became a question merely of the surrender of the city of Manila and as to whom it would prefer to have as its captors. The Spaniards preferred the Americans, because they knew if the Filipinos took possession there would be a dread and bloody reckoning for centuries of misgovernment and maladministration.

The leader of the Filipino insurrection had been Aguinaldo, who for certain reasons had retired from the islands and taken up his residence in Hongkong. With the coming of the Americans and their victory he was summoned to return, and if I am rightly informed, and I believe I have been, it was by the tacit consent of our Government, given inferentially if not distinctively, that Aguinaldo did return and operated in unison with the American armies as our ally to bring about the defeat of Spain and the entire capture of the province of Luzon. This came about in due time. An armistice took place, which was to last either until a treaty between our country and Spain was made and ratified by both countries or rejected. During the time of this armistice the treaty of Paris was concluded, and by that treaty Cuba and Puerto Rico became absolutely free of Spanish government and domination, and by the stipulation of that treaty the American Government paid to the Kingdom of Spain $20,000,000 for the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands. Sir, I voted with much hesitancy for the treaty of Paris. I believed then, as I believe now, that it would not conduce to our prosperity as a nation to carry our operations to the far-off Orient, and before I voted for the treaty I determined for myself to have an understanding as to the policy of the Administration so far as it was represented in the President of the United States and as to the ultimate purpose of our Government in connection with these islands.

I felt that I would not, either for the sake of my own country, for its honor or material advantage, or for the sake of the rights and privileges and aspirations of the Filipinos, vote for a treaty of this kind and character if it were the purpose of our Government to permanently acquire the islands and retain them as territory. I may be wrong, but, sir, I was left under the impression that it was not the purpose of the Administration to take forcible possession of this territory and permanently hold it against the armed protests of its population, many of whom had aided in defeating the common enemy during the Spanish-American war. Sir, I declare, in my judgment it was not then in contemplation to permanently acquire the islands, and the payment of the $20,000,000 was not considered as a price either for the square miles contained in the 1,500 islands that lay scattered in that eastern sea or for the bodies of the ten millions of inhabitants that dwell upon them. It was not intended to deprive them of the God-given right to govern themselves and to dwell under laws of their own making, and I desire to say further that, in my humble opinion, it is not now the intention of the President, either upon his personal wish or for political uses, to conquer the Filipinos and hold them as subjects against their protest. If such be his design he must have experienced a change of purpose since the adoption of the treaty of Paris.

As time passed, however, there seemed to be here and there an evidence that there was pressure being brought which should, after the adoption of the treaty and the payment of this price, bring about such a condition in our country as would make it imperative upon us to assume sovereignty permanently. It would have been well for us as a nation if Admiral Dewey could have retired from the Bay of Manila on the morn after he had destroyed the Spanish fleet, but he did not dare do so. He had destroyed the Spanish power, and it would not have been proper for him, as representative of the conquering nation, to depart and to leave anarchy and chaos remain instead of authority. Therefore through the weary months of the interregnum they remained. Manila was taken and the American power stood side by side with the Filipino forces. It was not until after the acceptance of the treaty that it became known that it was the purpose of some to bring about a misunderstanding which should end in war between the American forces and the Filipino army. War, however, did come as between the forces who had been working for the same end—the destruction of Spanish power.

It is said it came by Filipino attack. If that be true, and most probably it is, I can not defend it; and yet there is much excuse, for the Filipinos had been dwelling generation after generation under the domination of Spain, under treachery and cruelty, and they had no reason to expect from the maneuvers of the American armies, the breaches of faith and the failure of American promises, that the change of masters which had come would be greatly to their benefit. Therefore, being in possession of the greater part of their islands, they determined to stand by their arms and obtain, if possible, consideration in that manner. I believe it was wrong. I believe it was a mistaken idea. I have still faith enough in American honor to believe that under no circumstance will we be so far forgetful as to deprive these brave though misguided people of that which we hold dear to ourselves and which must of necessity be doubly dear to them.

The clash came between the two forces and the war began. I felt then that as an American I must stand by my Government, and that so long as there was armed resistance I must aid by voice and vote to bring about a condition of law and order, not for the sake of conquest, but with the intent of producing such a situation as would in due time bring about a home government for the Filipinos with which we could treat as a friendly power.

The war went on for a campaign. We had been assured that 6,000 men in a few weeks would restore order. The whole force of General Otis was employed for an entire campaign, and at the end of that campaign, though in the press the censored dispatches gave us victory after victory, we found at the end of that time that in fact little had been accomplished toward the pacification of the island of Luzon or any other island save perhaps that arrangement, made in a manner half diplomatic, half military, by which the United States of America entered into a compact to continue the government of the Sultan of Sulu in his domains. Another campaign has begun and the American people are looking forward to its results. I venture to assert now that no great advantage has as yet been obtained, and unless action is taken we may look forward in yonder islands to a war of a desultory character which may last for an indefinite period of time.

There should be some understanding, some conclusion, as to what the war in the islands really means. If it means a war of conquest, if it means a war to the bitter end, if it means that there must be absolute submission of the Filipinos to arbitrary American power, then you may look forward to that character of war which always comes when a weak people is making a struggle for liberty against a powerful foe. They will retire to their mountain fastnesses. They will issue forth from them and commit depredations, and a guerrilla warfare will become the order of the day. Shall it continue on for years? Is the American people to be called upon to send regiment after regiment of its youth, that should be employed in developing the natural resources of our country, to the far-off antipodes, to these islands of the sea, to lose their lives by the weapon of the insurgent or by the fever and plague of that distant zone? Shall we continue to pour million after million of treasure to deprive these poor people of the only wealth they have—their freedom? If so, I am not content to sit silently by, but will make such opposition as the deep conviction I have demands. But, sir, if it be war merely to reestablish order, to proclaim our sovereignty for the purpose of giving free government, then I believe it can and should be accomplished. Even this, to me, is an unfortunate situation, but it can not now be remedied. It is one of the resultant effects of the Spanish-American war.

It is neither fair nor just to attack the President or the Administration for the conduct of the present war. When the unfortunate contention began, the President could not do otherwise than uphold American authority and stand by American arms, and during the months of the interregnum between the two sessions of Congress it was his duty to continue this war for the upholding of American authority on the islands. The American forces could not be withdrawn, for the moment of their retreat or embarkation would have marked the beginning of internal disorder, and possibly foreign intervention. The American nation was compelled to hold its armies there, and the President would have been lacking in the fulfillment of his duty had he not made every endeavor to tranquilize the islands. That there was small measure of success should be charged neither to the commanding general nor to the Administration.

If this war continues doubtless all will learn the severe lesson that embarking upon such undertakings means loss, both in human life and in national treasure. It will be found a huge undertaking to attempt the subjugation of such a people with all the attendant difficulties that present themselves. But, sir, the period of the interregnum has passed; the responsibility of the President has ceased, for Congress is now in session and it is the duty of Congress to provide such legislation as will proclaim to the world in a manner emphatic and free from equivocation the design and purpose of our Government with the Philippine Islands. For this reason I have offered the resolution, plain and simple, making a declaration which can not be misunderstood. Adopt this resolution and I believe many of the tangles of the situation will be unraveled and the war will be hastened to a conclusion.

Sir, I oppose the permanent annexation of these islands for the reason that I believe it is in opposition to the basic principle of our Government. I oppose the permanent annexation of these islands because I believe it is unrighteous and unjust to deprive any people of their right of governing themselves. I oppose this mode of expansion because I believe it to be to the detriment of our people, for, sir, if we are to forcibly acquire this territory, we must incorporate it as part of ourselves and take its people as full partners of our institutions, admit them to citizenship and to all the rights and privileges of that condition as we enjoy it here, or we must by the hand of our power strike down the right for which we have ever contended and make them our serfs and subjects and political slaves.

I object strenuously to either of these conditions. I am not in favor of bringing the Filipino into full communion with American citizenship, and I deprecate forcing a government upon him which prevents his enjoying all the privileges of a free citizen in his own land. There can be no "benevolent assimilation"; there should be no tyrannical absorption. That part of the population of the Philippines that has emerged from barbarism has Spanish civilization, Spanish language, Spanish religion. Their education, home life, and code of honor are all Spanish. We have nothing in common with them. They are apart from us in every aspiration, save that they crave the right to govern themselves. We are inhabitants of a temperate climate; they are dwellers of the Torrid Zone. We can not, by reason of the climate, dwell with them; they will not come to us, and it would not be well that they should. Their environments are as different from our own as distance and atmospheric conditions can make them. We can not successfully satisfy their wants, for their needs, requirements, sentiments, and ideas stand in antagonism with ours. Our Government and our mode of administration is not adapted to the situation existing among the Filipinos.

But, sir, beyond all this, they do not desire affiliation with us. They demand, as they are entitled to do, home rule. We are great and strong. Can we not be just—nay, more than that, generous to these oppressed people? We have as a nation received generous treatment from a powerful ally when we were weak beginners in the art of self-government. In the Revolutionary war the French people gave the American patriots aid upon land and sea. Their army and navy assisted in the hour of utmost peril and brought victory from the very jaws of defeat. Without them the British surrender at Yorktown could not have been accomplished, and final independence would have failed. At the close of that war the colonies were free, but they lay prostrate; they were exhausted. Chaos reigned and terror was abroad.

Did France turn upon the young Republic and rend it because it was weak and its struggle seemed unavailing? Nay; though the Bourbon reigned, still was there proffered to our people the helpful hand which was to raise up, not the powerful arm to smite. Oh, my countrymen, let us not forget that hour, but stand in the lustrous light of its remembrance and bless our Philippine allies with the same measure of benefit. Can a Republic, owing such a debt of gratitude, afford to be less generous now than was the monarchy of France more than a century ago? Would it not be the irony of fate that we should begin a war with the intention of striking down a tyrant nation because it would not grant freedom to its rebellious dependency, Cuba, and in the ending of that war begin another to punish a second colony of that selfsame power because it dared to aspire to the boon of self-government and ourselves become enslavers? We dare not do so, for liberty would depart from us and seek another resting place beyond our borders. Her curse would descend upon us, and all her attendant train of beneficent spirits would disdain longer to abide with us.

But, say the advocates of "imperial destiny," these inhabitants of the far-off islands are not capable of self-government. They are too ignorant to know their own supreme interest, too inexperienced to found a government, too weak to maintain their liberty.

Sir, the people that aspire to liberty deserve it. The nation that struggles for self-government and gives the lives of its patriotic men in the endeavor to achieve it is neither too inexperienced to establish nor too weak to defend a republic. There can be no doubt that these islanders have fought with undaunted courage, with resolute endeavor, with fervor and constancy. In the campaign of last year they met our troops, and though almost defenseless—most of them armed with primitive weapons—they threw themselves against the advancing columns of our army, met every disadvantage with the bravery of desperation, and gave their lives in a vain endeavor to retard our triumphant advance; and when they fell their women stepped into the ranks to fill the places of the dead.

Not only have they courage, but they have intelligence and ability. They have demonstrated their capability of founding a government. The conditions in Luzon for establishing a republic, under the leadership of Aguinaldo and his compatriots, is as favorable as that of Cuba, if not more so. The proclamations of the Filipino chieftain show him to be possessed of the elements of statecraft and diplomacy. The constitution adopted by the government of Aguinaldo will compare favorably with that of the South American Republics, and for the conditions existing in the archipelago it is perhaps as wisely constructed as our own organic law. The government they would establish may not be similar to ours, save in the kinship of purpose, but it will be infinitely better than any form of administration that we could give if we hold the islands permanently, after beating down opposition by fire and sword.

The Senator from Indiana drew a superb picture of ideal men who should represent our Government in the new possessions and administer affairs to the inhabitants. Surely he knew that the ideal is unattainable, and that men are much the same in their passions, vices, and ambitions as they were a century and a half ago, when Englishmen, as the representatives of his "Most Christian Majesty's" Government, led by avarice and greed, transgressed every law of God and man, committed every crime in the decalogue in the administration of government in the British dependencies, with the one purpose of amassing fortunes for themselves and their employers—the British nation. Does he not know that opportunity makes dishonesty thrive, that government begun by conquest and continued by force makes despots, and that men invested with extraordinary power, untrammelled by close inspection, and far from the home government breed corruption? War begets pestilence, famine, and death.

Despotic government is productive of every species of depravity. Having bound by cords of tyranny a people, you cast to the wind all restraint upon the satraps who are to command them, and where safeguards are lacking there license begins. Therefore we should grant the just demands of these islanders. Let not the end of three and a half centuries of Spanish servitude be the beginning of another term of enslavement by America. The Filipino may fail in much, but he will be free, and to freemen all things are possible. He will slowly but surely rise and evolve such a standard of government as will be both honorable to us and beneficial to him. Instead of using our Army to subdue and subjugate him, let them restore and guard his interests and protect him against any and all comers who would intervene until he is strong enough to stand alone; then, as a friendly nation, treat with him and receive from him such concessions as are deemed to be of advantage in eastern waters, and by such action welcome to the family of nations a new republic, with the cheery wish "God speed you on your way!" Benedictions from a grateful people will be showered upon us as rose leaves upon the quiet waters of a brook, and blessed fruit will spring from them; both nations will prosper apart; each will reap advantageous results.

I have said that in justice we must not forcibly absorb and hold them as subjects. Yet it would be equally disastrous to attempt incorporation with ourselves, with the grant of all the rights and privileges of American citizenship. I believe such a course would be disadvantageous to the great body of our own people. And, sir, for good and sufficient reasons, as a nation we have attained a larger measure of success in a century and a quarter than did the modern European kingdoms in ten centuries. We have achieved not only political freedom, but commercial independence.

When the colonies cast aside English domination they were an agricultural people. Under British influence they had been denied manufactures. After the Revolution and the erection of our magnificent superstructure of constitutional power, population began to find its way to the western Republic from every state in Europe, for here the oppressed of every nationality and every condition in life hopes to find a new home and a betterment of condition. They sought to find freedom of conscience, civil liberty, and material well-being. By the creation of new industries there was abundant employment for all. With unexampled rapidity the march of the pioneer cleared the way to the westward, carved Commonwealths out of the wilderness, and bound ocean to ocean, across 3,000 miles of continent, with bands of steel and currents of electricity. In this manner the natural resources of our country have been developed under the American system of protection. Our progress has been so extraordinary that cities have risen as if by magic, manufacturing interests have leapt into being in a day, mines have multiplied, and agriculture has advanced with equal swiftness, hand in hand with industrial activity upon the highway of national progress.

Under these conditions the American citizen, the laborer, the workman, and the artisan have risen to a loftier plane and to greater dignity than their brothers in even the most favored countries of Europe. Under the benign influence of this American system of protective tariff, labor of every character and description enjoys higher remuneration and better wages than in any other land. But in the latter years of our history emigration from foreign soil assumed such proportions as to counteract the effect of the tariff to a degree that it was found necessary to enact laws restricting the influx of labor, and even now Congress is considering the matter of additional legislation deemed necessary to still further retard and decrease the coming to our shores of the labor of England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany, France, Italy, Scandinavia, and other countries.

Now, let us for a moment consider. If it is incumbent upon us in order to safeguard American interests to deny admission to the comparatively intelligent labor of European countries when it knocks at the entrance of our ports, when it is necessary to enact drastic legislation upon immigration for the purpose of keeping the high standard of American wages protected, as it is by impost duties, would it be well to reach out 8,000 miles beyond our western coast, and, by the contemplated policy of imperial destiny, make the Philippines American soil and the inhabitants, to the number of millions, competitors of American labor without any protective duty to intervene? I am not ready to sacrifice the well-being of our people for the glittering bauble of Philippine sovereignty by the acquirement of the far-off archipelago.

Beyond question the incorporation of 10,000,000 Filipinos, with their peculiar surroundings, the cheapness of labor and of living, to enter into competition in American markets (without restriction) with the labor of the citizen of Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, California, South Carolina, or Texas, or any of the five and forty States of the Union, would lower the scale of American wages and the standard of American living. Not only would this occur, but under the treaty of Paris the Spaniards are conceded the same privileges in Philippine ports that Americans are to enjoy; and if we make them American soil, without protective tariff or impost duties, what is to prevent the commodities made by cheap labor of Spain from being sent to Manila free of duty, and from thence to the citizens of this country, that they may thus compete and put down the price of like commodities produced among ourselves? It may be contended, however, that present duties will be maintained, and Americans shall pay duties in Philippine ports, thus preventing the free importation of Spanish goods to Manila and the free importation to our own ports of goods of Philippine manufacture. If this is to be the policy, then what advantage has the American trader in the possession of these islands? How will the situation be improved for American trade more than it would be if we did not claim sovereignty? Such a situation would not long continue without causing discontent and difficulty.

Our triumphs in the realm of national development have come by the avoidance of external complications, ever heeding the advice of Washington that the nation should beware of "foreign entanglements," and the continuous policy has been, if I may be permitted to use an American phrase, "strict attention to our own business." The energies of the nation have been directed to internal improvements, and we have wrought a marvelous transformation; but there is still a vast domain at home which will for centuries furnish material for all the labor of mind and muscle which we and our descendants, with their coworkers, can give. Shall we leave this great work undone, let it fall into disuse or neglect, and join the concourse of European nationalities who seek power in the Orient and the distant south for the acquisition of territory and employment for their surplus population, by activities in the partition of China, conquest of Africa, and the appropriation unto themselves of the ragged edges of the earth in many climes?

There may be excuse for our cousins across the sea in such endeavor, for their area is small, their cities overcrowded, and a vent must be found for the ill-fed and underpaid millions who drag out a weary existence from the beginning to the close of life's journey. And then, too, they have never contended for the propositions of freedom, which are the foundation stones of our superstructure of state. Many of them still hold to the monarchical principle, which claims sovereignty and the right to rule by the grace of God, and not by the will of the people. We, however, can not plead such excuse in extenuation of our conduct, should we engage in such enterprise. We should devote our youth and strength to the task of fortifying our present high position, and first look to it that all is well at home. This done, our object and aim should be to have the influence of American thought and the strong hand of American power reach out beyond our borders in favor of liberty, freedom, and self-government among all men.

And, sir, to my mind a golden opportunity to give the world a bright example of our faith, by works, is to crown the desire of the Filipino for self-government with fulfillment. The resolution I have offered has this object in view. It will give a positive declaration of our purpose. It will relieve the President of the responsibility he has been compelled to assume, for it is the duty of Congress at this time, without further delay, to enter upon the task of solving this problem. It is a duty which can not be avoided, and I trust that no member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives will shrink from meeting squarely the issue now placed before him. The contention of the expansionist has been, and I believe a just contention, that the situation in the Philippines could not be avoided; that war had come as between the natives and our invading army, not by our own seeking; and though I have grave doubts of the correctness of this proposition, I am willing for the present to concede it. They say further that the war can not cease until there is a settlement of the questions at issue and that those who objected to it, who deprecate its continuance, can not offer a solution for the existing difficulty.

Sir, I believe this resolution, if adopted, will conclude the war in a manner both honorable and glorious to the American nation, as well as our present foes, the Filipinos. The moment it is known that the American Congress has committed itself squarely to this declaration upon the war, that the policy of the Government has been clearly defined, and that our end and aim is to give to them the boon they have desired, there will be submission to American authority, and the era of peace in Luzon and the neighboring islands will have come. If we fail to do this, either the present uncertainty will remain, the war will drag its length through the months to come, the bitterness of continued struggle will grow upon either side, we will be doing battle without definite purpose, and encouraging the supposition that many hold that our intention is to seize and hold perpetually as colonies these islands. If such be the purpose of the Administration and the majority party, then let it be made known in a direct, unequivocal, and manly fashion. Doubt and uncertainty will cease, and the nation will stand face to face with a new dispensation in its affairs. I shall protest against it. I have a deep conviction that it will be a national crime which would ever blot the escutcheon of the nation and remain a stain upon the national honor. And having these convictions, I must stand against every attempt made to carry into effect such a grievous error.

I come of a stubborn race. We are perhaps dull and slow of learning, but a lesson once taught is with us not easily forgotten; an opinion once formed, which becomes a heartfelt conviction, will not be surrendered. History tells us that nearly four centuries ago a German peasant became an Augustinian monk. As such, after years of mental struggle, he found himself compelled to stand against the existing order. He became the great reformer of the sixteenth century, and as he stood alone before the combined forces of the Roman hierarchy and the German Empire he refused to recant what he had written; and when the anathema of the church and the ban of the Empire were about to be hurled upon his devoted head he stood before the vast assemblage and said, "I have a deep conviction. I can not recant unless I am refuted. It is not expedient to act against conscience. God help me. Amen." Coming of his race and people, I feel today a faint reflection of the strong will and fixed conviction of this man. I have a deep conviction. It has not been shaken and I will not swerve from it; and I close my appeal for justice to the Filipino with the declaration that neither party policy nor personal interest in a future career shall cause me to surrender the right "as God gives me to see the right." [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, on next Tuesday I will submit some remarks on Senate resolution No. 68, declaring certain proposed amendments to the constitution of North Carolina in contravention of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. BACON. I ask leave of the Senate to call up for one moment the joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, which was introduced by me, for the purpose of asking that an amendment may be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to call up Senate joint resolution 45, heretofore introduced by him, and which is on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BACON. In the sixth resolution I ask to have the words stricken out which are indicated and the words substituted which are written.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. BACON. It is not necessary to read it. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution as amended is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war—the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

SEC. 2. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

SEC. 3. That the United States, having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful vocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

SEC. 4. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands, and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

SEC. 5. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy, in the judgment of the United States, to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of their islands to their people.

SEC. 6. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through such means and measures as may be deemed most efficient and appropriate, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

Mr. BACON. In this connection I desire to state that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the permission of the Senate to call up the joint resolution S. R. 45 for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution as amended will be printed and lie on the table, subject to the Senator's call.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that, with the indulgence of the Senate, on Monday, after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], I will make some remarks on the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and other cognate resolutions now on the table.

VOID ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 386) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands" was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length and it went over under objection without prejudice.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is ready, I think, to go on with his remarks upon the financial bill, House bill No. 1, and I ask unanimous consent that it may now be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when I concluded yesterday I had taken up the bill for a brief examination and had reached the third section of the measure as it passed the House. As I stated yesterday, this bill provides for a division of issue and redemption. As I understand, the Department has full power under it to create such divisions without any statute, so far as the ordinary administration of the Treasury Department is concerned. After this division is created there are the following provisions:

There shall be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and taken up on the books of said division as a redemption fund the amount of gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, the amount of United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates; the amount of silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates; the amount in silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

These are made payable specifically in coin by this act, although they would be under the general provisions of the act without that, I believe. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] seems to approve of that provision. I do not know why they saw fit to treat those separately. In addition, there shall be deposited in this division a sufficient—amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

I understand that this sum is about $110,000,000. Is that correct? At the present time it will require a transfer of about $110,000,000 to this division.

Mr. ALDRICH. A hundred and nine million dollars, perhaps.

Mr. TELLER. I was not exact.

The bill then provides, in section 4:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund taken up on the books of the division of issue and redemption, as herein provided, and for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

That gives the Secretary, as I understand, everything in the Treasury against which there is not an appropriation standing—or may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury—

That is a mere exchange.

And in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year. But no transfer shall at any time be made from the general fund of the Treasury to the division of issue and redemption which will reduce the general fund below $50,000,000.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government.

That means, if it means anything at all, that every dollar we have is redeemable in gold, if the Secretary sees fit so to redeem it. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island, who is sitting near me, if that is not what it means?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not so sure that I understand the provision of that section as it stands in the bill, and, therefore, I can not offhand answer the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. That is the way I construe it, that every dollar of paper money, if the Secretary sees fit so to rule, becomes a charge upon the gold reserve in this division.

Yesterday the Senator from South Dakota asked me if there had been any silver dollars redeemed in gold, to which I replied with the greatest confidence that there had not been, because I had so frequently inquired of the Department whether it had been done that I supposed I could not be mistaken. Since then I have been handed by a Senator a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that since the 4th day of March, 1897, there have been silver dollars and silver certificates equal to about $19,000,000 redeemed in gold. I do not think that makes any difference in the argument I was making that the silver dollar takes care of itself. During that time there have been $6,000,000 of silver exchanged for gold, leaving a net redemption of silver perhaps by gold somewhere in the neighborhood of $12,000,000.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this clause is exceedingly objectionable, if we are to escape that of which we have heard so much of late—this endless chain which was drawing gold out of the Treasury. It is true the act of 1893 declared it was the policy of the Government to maintain parity. There was no authority given the officer that he did not have before to maintain the parity in that way, as I understand it; and up to March 4, 1893, it never had been exercised at any time. The act of 1890 also contained a declaration of the same general character, but during all that time, with the exception of the statement made by Mr. Carlisle, that if it became necessary to maintain the parity he would redeem in gold, there has been nothing done in that direction.

If this is true the charge upon the gold of $150,000,000 will aggregate almost a thousand million dollars. It is, under the House bill, $109,000,000. It will be a charge on the $109,000,000, or under the Senate amendment it would be upon the $150,000,000, because that amendment raises it arbitrarily to $150,000,000. Now, if we are to redeem all these securities, all these debts—for they are debts, of course; the silver certificate is nothing but a debt, with silver lying there to pay it—that $109,000,000 is not enough.

I know it may be said that the bill as passed by the House will not be before the Senate and will not be the bill; but, Mr. President, logically and technically the House bill is before us, and that is what we are considering. If we make the amendment, the House may not agree to it.

Mr. SPOONER. We are considering both measures.

Mr. TELLER. As the Senator from Wisconsin says, we are really considering both measures. But, as I said the other day, knowing something about the methods, I think I should prefer to discuss the House bill now rather than to attempt to discuss it on a conference report, which, in the way it might come here, would be somewhat difficult to do.

I repeat, Mr. President, if you are going to go to the gold standard and redeem everything in gold, $100,000,000 will not be sufficient.

THE RESERVE.

Before I get through, or at some other time, I expect to make some remarks upon the impossibility of maintaining the $150,000,000 reserve under the present condition of the world if a financial storm should strike any part of the world with severity.

And if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may at his discretion exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

I have not read the whole of the provision. This follows:

The notes and certificates so redeemed—

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to this language. How are we to get out these certificates? I know there was some discussion in another place and that some claimed that there would be difficulty, while others asserted that there would not be. I myself see a great deal of difficulty in doing it:

The notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged, except as hereinbefore in this section provided.

Now, Mr. President, when the notes are redeemed they go into this division in the Treasury. We will suppose there are $50,000,000 of them put in. Now, you can not get them out under this bill unless somebody goes there with gold and takes them out. Is not that what it means? I think nobody will dispute that.

I will read further. Then, here is something about the act of the 14th of July, 1890, which does not belong here. Then there are several provisions about silver and all that. I do not care to spend much time on those. We have got the gold out and the certificates, whatever they may be, greenbacks or whatever has been redeemed, in there. They can not be got out except for gold.

Now, no one wants to go there and deposit gold and take them out. In the meantime they run down until they have reached the point where the Secretary of the Treasury is compelled to reimburse the fund. He can reimburse the fund in various ways. He may reimburse it by exchanging for gold from the Treasury, if it is there. He can exchange it with anybody. He can receive deposits, etc. But suppose no one comes to make deposits, and there is not gold in the Treasury for him to exchange. Then he is authorized to sell bonds. Suppose he does sell bonds. Suppose he sells $50,000,000 of bonds and replaces the $50,000,000 that have gone out. The notes go in there. Then you have $100,000,000, and nobody then comes with his gold. You repeat that operation again with another $50,000,000, and so on ad infinitum.

Now, is not there a way to do what so many of the gold financiers of this country have been insisting on should be done—that is, to lock up the Treasury notes and greenbacks and silver certificates, and put us absolutely on nothing but gold as a circulating medium? If the bill does not mean that, then it is a very extraordinary measure and a badly drawn bill. But that was the theory; that has been the demand of the junta which prepared this bill and directed the House of Representatives to pass it. I hope this language will not be offensive to the House.

But, Mr. President, the party that claimed, through the public press and elsewhere, to have originated this bill, and its paternity has never been denied, have been proclaiming everywhere from the housetops that the way to come to a proper and sound financial condition is to retire the greenbacks either by destroying them by law or by the executive interference of the Treasury Department by locking them up, and that is what is meant, Mr. President. I will say by way of parenthesis that that is what the Senate provision means, too, in my judgment. Later, perhaps, I may touch on that.

The bill comes here, then, as a contracting bill. I do not know but that it would be a good time for me to make an inquiry, unless somebody can question my assertion, whether under these provisions there is any way to get these redeemed notes back into the Treasury except by an exchange for gold? It was said in another place that the Secretary of the Treasury would have the right to put that first $50,000,000 back into the general fund without receiving gold therefor. But to do that would be a plain, palpable violation of the letter and spirit of this act, and that could not possibly be the proper interpretation. There could be but one way to get it out, and that would be by future legislation.

I do not believe you could get any future legislation in that direction. I think you would find in a short time that all the greenbacks in this country were locked up, redeemed, and then the people who have been complaining that they have been reissued from time to time and have talked about the absurdity of the Government buying its debts and then putting them out again, as if the Government was in the exercise of an ordinary commercial transaction in these money relations, which is not true, would insist that they could not again perform money functions unless exchanged for gold. If we should attempt to issue new ones, we would be met by the arguments we have had here for twenty years against the Government issuing paper money. The silver certificates would get there in due time, and there would take the place of this paper money that it costs us nothing to circulate an interest-bearing 3 per cent bond. I do not see how anybody can escape that conclusion. It is as true as Holy Writ that it is within the province of the Secretary of the Treasury to put every silver certificate and every greenback and every Treasury note into that fund and hold it there and replace it by interest-bearing bonds, which will amount to almost a thousand million dollars.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A thousand million dollars?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; if you take the greenbacks and Treasury notes and the silver certificates, the sum amounts to in the neighborhood of a thousand million dollars.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The thing I had in mind was how that could be refunded or placed in bonds without some further legislation, either in the House bill or out of it.

Mr. TELLER. There is no such thing in the bill as coming here for permission to issue bonds; I am going to touch on that.

In 1875, when we proposed to go to resumption, we put in, for the first time in any statute in the civilized world, in my judgment, a provision for the unlimited issue of bonds in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. No such thing was ever done in Great Britain; no such thing was done in any other country, so far as I know. Mr. President, I am willing to say that up to 1885 that prerogative had never been abused, but, in my opinion, it was most grossly abused under the Administration of Mr. Cleveland. It is not any answer to my objection to say that this power will not be abused. It will be abused; and if it is not abused it is a false system of finance that turns over to one man, the President of the United States, the power to put out an unlimited amount of bonds simply because he may think it necessary to maintain the parity between the silver dollar and the gold dollar.

STABLE MONEY.

Now, I want to say just one word more about parity. Whenever you have a righteous system of finances, that opens your mints to gold and silver alike at fixed ratio, the Government of the United States has no concern as to whether the money that is paid out from the mint purchases more or less. The Government's interest ceases when it has given to the people a silver or a gold dollar of a proper fineness and character, so that the fineness in the silver dollar and the gold dollar is correct and the weight is the proper weight. When the Government has done that, Mr. President, its province, all its functions have ceased, or should cease.

Why should we undertake to maintain the parity between a silver dollar and a gold dollar? It is desirable, I admit; stable money is the greatest blessing that can be given to the human race; but it is not in the power of anyone except Divinity to make a stable dollar. You may maintain the relation of your gold dollar with your silver dollar by an obligation on the part of the Government to take up the gold and give a silver dollar, or to take up the silver and give a gold dollar. But it is not in this exchange that the trouble comes with unstable money. It is when to-day a dollar buys a bushel of wheat and the next day it buys two.

Now, has anybody in the history of the finances of the world been able to find out how you could have a stable dollar? Why, Mr. President, a gentleman in the House the other day said: "We are for the gold dollar, the dollar that is always a dollar, a dollar that is 100 cents." There is no such thing as stable money in the sense that it never varies with reference to commodities.

What we call stable money is money that goes for a length of time buying an equal amount of commodities. Yet, I repeat, no money has been invented, no money has ever been in circulation that continues all the time with the same command over commodities. It can not do so. A few years ago a gold dollar or a silver dollar would buy in my part of the country $2\frac{1}{2}$ bushels of wheat, and the very next year it took a considerable amount more of either gold or silver to buy 2 bushels of wheat than it did the year before to buy $2\frac{1}{2}$ bushels. It may be said that the purchasing power of the dollar is the same but that the price of wheat had risen. I admit that that is the rule we have applied always when it is only one item, but old Locke said in 1777, and nobody has ever disputed the statement since, that I know of, that when the whole range of prices rise or fall the change is not in the commodity but in the money.

You are now boasting of the prosperity that has come to this country, which my friends on this side of the Chamber attribute not to the beneficence of Providence, but to the action of the President of the United States. You tell us prices have risen all over the country 15 per cent. They have risen more than that on some things; but what is that but the lowering of the purchasing power of the dollar?

If it is the business of the Government of the United States to keep the silver dollar and the gold dollar interchangeable, always bearing the same relation to each other, why is it not the same duty on the part of the Government to keep its dollar always purchasing the same amount of a commodity? Why, a man would be crazy in these days who tried to do that. It has been tried. I can show you statutes providing that a given amount of gold should buy so much wheat and so much corn. I can show the decrees of kings that every man should give so much wheat for so much gold, so much wheat for so much silver. But men did not do it. History says that those statutes and those orders were in a little while disregarded.

Oh, no, Mr. President, you can not keep money stable. The relation that one kind of money bears to another, if it is primary money, if it is the world's money, will never seriously vary. It will never be of such a divergence as to disturb commerce and trade, for if too much in one country it will go to some other.

Of course, if there was a great demand, as there was from 1850 to 1860 for silver in Asia, and Asia was demanding more silver every year than the mints could produce, there would be a divergence in favor of silver as against gold, as there was at that time.

If, as in 1808, 1809, and 1810, let us say during the Napoleonic wars, there was a great demand all over Europe, outside of England, for silver, because silver was the only standard money of the Continent at that time, there would be a difference in favor of a dollar of silver; and if there should come, as there did come, a great demand for gold because certain states went not to the gold standard, but to the use of gold, which they had not been using as money, then there might come a demand for gold, such as made gold rise so as to be at a premium of 17 per cent in Hamburg, where it was nothing but merchandise, where you could not open a bank account with it any more than you could with wool or wheat or cotton, where the Bank of Hamburg would not lend you a dollar on it because silver was the only money which it recognized. Although not standard money, it went at one time, according to the evidence before the bullion committee of 1810, to 17½ per cent premium.

It went to that premium over bank notes in England. Gold was the standard in England, but England was without either much gold or silver. The Bank of England having been allowed to suspend specie payments and to issue a great quantity of notes, there was a divergence between the paper and the gold. There was a most singular condition there. I do not know that I am able to account for it, and I have not been able to find anybody who ever did, but it is a historical fact that is very interesting. Gold bore a premium in England of from 5 to 15 per cent over Bank of England notes. It was only needed for export, and everybody said the rate of exchange was from 5 to 27 per cent, as I think it went at one time, and yet the evidence shows that during all that time a man who had a note on the Bank of England could buy just as much exchange on continental Europe with that bank note as he could with gold.

I attribute the circumstance to the interference by law, which our friends here tell us never affects money in any shape or manner, nor even the material out of which money is made. There could have been no other reason than that there was a law against the exportation of gold. And so the man who sold exchange had to take the chances of getting into the penitentiary over there if he exported gold to cover his draft that he drew on the banks of continental Europe. The law was the same as to both silver and gold. No English coin nor bar made out of English coin, either of gold or silver, could be exported without the man who exported it taking the chances of a prison life. Some of the witnesses before the bullion committee said that if the restriction against export were taken off, they believed that immediately the rate of exchange would go to par.

Now, what I am trying to say (and I want to say it so that I think it can be understood not only here but elsewhere) is that there is no obligation on the Government of the United States to undertake to say that its money shall always have the same purchasing power, because that is an impossibility; and if they are obliged to do that, which is the great evil of an unstable money, they are not required to go to this expense of interchanging one dollar for another which is just as good as the other in the domestic affairs of this nation, and load up this country with a debt such as will be incurred under the provisions of this bill.

BANKING UNDER THE BILL.

The next provision of the House bill relates to the banking business. Mr. President, that is an ugly question to touch. Nobody agrees in this country with another as to what the banking system ought to be, and I certainly would not assume that I know what it ought to be. I know some things about it that ought not to be. I am very confident I know that the suggestion made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report is not one that the American people want to follow. I assume that this somewhat difficult and to me somewhat uncertain provision about the banks is intended as the beginning of such a system as the Secretary of the Treasury is now in favor of—a bank issue based on credits on deposits; that is, the greater the debt, the greater the issue of bank notes.

I have been contending for a good many years for the use of silver, and I have been charged on this floor and elsewhere with a desire to have a cheap money. No, I do not want any cheap money. But I do not want any dear money; and if I can not have a righteous money which is neither dear nor cheap, I would much prefer to have cheap money than to have dear money. But, Mr. President, I do not want any cheap money under this bank bill as provided by the House. I am opposed to banks issuing money at all. It is not the province of a bank in a commercial sense to issue money, and for a long time in the history of banking the banks did not issue money. They had a system of credits by which they gave one man credit and transferred that to another; but the issue of bank paper is comparatively modern. I do not mean to say it has come in my day, Mr. President, and yours, but I mean it has come to us within the last two hundred years; and, in my judgment, the commercial world has suffered greatly by the improper issue of bank paper.

I admit that there is not gold and silver enough in the world to do the business of the world. It might have been done if we had remained, perhaps, upon a silver and a gold basis, a metallic basis; but since we have gone to the system of issuing paper money, I do not think we can quit. But if we do have bank paper it must be based on something better than individual credit.

My understanding is that money is the creature of law. I know that somebody will say, "Oh, well, Senator TELLER is a fiatist." Mr. President, there never was any money under the sun that was not the creation of law. I do not mean that gold bullion and silver bullion did not perform monetary functions, but it was a voluntary exchange not of money but of one kind of merchandise with great value and small space for another. But it was barter, just as much as an exchange of wheat for wool or wool for wheat would be. Money is the creation of law. So said Xenophon, so said Aristotle, and so has said every writer of repute who has written since the days of Aristotle.

I remember in 1896 a distinguished speaker in Chicago said it was not within the power of Congress nor of Parliament nor of any body to make a dollar; that nature had made the dollar. Mr. President, if nature has made the dollar, nature must have made a great variety of dollars. It made a dollar of one size in one country and a dollar of another size in another country. Whenever you confer upon a dollar the legal-tender power which compels one man to take it from another in discharge of a debt, it is a creation, a money function by law. You can put in the dollar to-day 25.8 grains of standard gold, and, if you choose, you can to-morrow put in but 20 grains. In our first gold dollar we put in 27 grains of standard gold, and now we have in a gold dollar 25.8 grains. We had a silver dollar with 416 grains of standard silver; we now have a silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver.

There is the same defect in the Senate substitute as to bank issues as exists in the House bill. But I believe I shall leave that for a moment and take up other parts of the bill, because I do not wish to extend my remarks beyond a reasonable time.

SENATE BILL PROVISIONS.

The Senate substitute simply reiterates in somewhat more appropriate language the provision as to the unit of value. It says:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold .9 fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value—

I suppose it would have been the standard of value without that provision, would it not? I do not think there is anything in this bill which would have repealed the provision made in 1873, that the gold dollar should be the unit of value. The substitute continues—and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard.

That is equivalent to the declaration made in the House bill that the Government must maintain the purchasing relation between the silver dollar and the gold dollar. Now, mind you, that is all you do when you maintain the parity. You must maintain the purchasing power of both silver and gold, and you can not get rid of it; but you must assume the burden of saying, if the world should want silver and could not get it, and silver should go, as it went in London more than once, to 10 cents above the mint price on the Continent, you will make the debt-paying power as between the silver and gold dollar relatively the same. You can not do that unless you give more gold for it than 100 cents. On the other hand, in my mind, it is quite as likely that somebody will want the gold of this country, and gold may be wanted to such an extent that the silver dollar here may be in greater circulation than the gold dollar.

If the variation between the dollars comes, one dollar or the other for the time being will be in greater demand for the transactions of domestic commerce. Which will that be? When the demand I speak of came for silver in England, it was for silver to go to India, where it was needed and where it was of greater value than in England, and the India demand put it to a premium.

Mr. President, demand for domestic use is always for the cheaper money. If gold becomes relatively cheaper than silver, gold will be what every man in commercial life will seize upon with which to pay his debts; and just as soon as he begins to use the gold, which is below par, we will say, that use, that demand, brings it up to a level with the other money. The fact that he does not take other dollars or the higher dollar brings that down to a lower level. That is one of the beauties of bimetallism.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire, if one were above the other, would not that offer an excuse to the Government to issue more bonds?

Mr. TELLER. Of course; for the Government would have to maintain the parity and would have to exchange the dearer money for the cheaper money, or to issue more bonds and take them up at a premium. There is difficulty in circulating money made of two different kinds of metal. If the demand should be very great for one, the coin of that metal may depart from the country; but it will come back in time, and the relation will never be a disturbed relation for any considerable length of time. That is the history of money. That relation must be practically close, because the demand for domestic use is always for the cheaper money, and the lack of or lessened demand for the dear money lessens its value, and so the equilibrium is maintained.

It is provided in section 2 of the substitute—

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to secure the prompt and certain redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes as hereinbefore provided, to set apart in the Treasury a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin, which fund shall be used for such redemption purposes only, and whenever and as often as any of said notes shall be redeemed from said fund it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use said notes so redeemed to restore and maintain such reserve fund in the manner following, to wit: First, by exchanging the notes so redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the United States notes so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes, in accordance with the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That provision of the proposed statute simply enables the Secretary of the Treasury to buy coin. Mr. Cleveland made one of his bond issues under a provision of law similar to it, but I have forgotten which issue it was. That is the bond issue when he made private arrangements with people in New York for gold bonds. I think that is the only time he availed himself of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, though I may be mistaken.

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods, and the amount of such gold coin in said fund shall at any time fall below $100,000,000, then it shall be his duty to restore the same to the maximum sum of $150,000,000 by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per cent per annum—

These bonds are "to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue"— and the gold coin received from the sale of said bonds shall first be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanged, in the manner hereinbefore provided, for an equal amount of the notes redeemed and held for exchange, and the United States notes exchanged in accordance with the provisions of this section shall, when covered into the Treasury, be reissued as now provided for by law, and the gold coin in the reserve fund, together with the redeemed notes held for use as provided in this section, shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000.

Section 3 provides for canceling the Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890. Those notes seem to be very obnoxious to both branches of Congress. I do not know why.

The fourth section:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $50, and to issue gold certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20, and the coin so deposited shall be retained in the Treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand and used for no other purpose.

The section continues:

Such certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued, and when held by any national banking association may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve: Provided, That whenever and so long as the gold coin held in the reserve fund in the Treasury for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes shall fall and remain below $100,000,000 the authority to issue certificates as herein provided shall be suspended.

That is the present law, as I understand.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the intention of the present law.

Mr. TELLER. That is the act of 1882.

Then the committee in the substitute describe the character of the bonds to be issued. The same power is given, I think, to the Secretary of the Treasury in the substitute that is given in the clause of the House bill for maintaining the parity, to which I have called attention. I do not wish to repeat myself on that point.

REFUNDING THE DEBT.

Then comes the proposition that we refund the public debt. Some of our obligations are due; $25,000,000, I believe, are payable at the option of the Government. Some of them, I do not recall how many, will be due in 1904—$100,000,000, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says—some in 1907, and some in 1908. Eight hundred and forty million dollars or $850,000,000 are to be refunded in 2 per cent bonds, which are to be made the basis of the banking system of this country, as I understand. That is supposed to be the merit of the bill, as this provision is to be the agency which will secure their exchange, for the banks will use them, as I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to say in his address the other day in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is one of its merits.

Mr. TELLER. Well, one of them. I have no doubt that these bonds will be exchanged to some extent; but I doubt very much whether all of them will be exchanged until about the time they become due.

But, Mr. President, in this exchange of bonds is the Trojan horse. Here is the declaration that these bonds are payable in gold. The Senator from Rhode Island the other day, when he was addressing the Senate, said one of the objects of this bill was to strengthen the public credit—I shall not have time to read what he said—and that another object was to remove the burden of taxation from the people. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will admit that the burden of taxation can be removed from the people to some extent by reducing the interest on the bonds; but I am at a loss to understand how you can remove the burden of taxation by issuing new bonds. That is the feature of this bill which renders it acceptable to the class of men in this country who have been trying to accomplish what they call financial reform.

These bonds as they are exchanged are to be the basis of the banking system of the United States. Mr. President, when the Secretary of the Treasury, under the power given in this bill—whether the House bill or the Senate substitute, I care not which—has tied up and destroyed the paper money of this country, the people of the United States will be upon a paper basis in part at least, and that will be paper issued entirely by the banks.

GOLD MONOMETALLISM AND BANK CURRENCY.

In 1893, when we repealed the Sherman Act, I predicted that the attack would be made upon the greenbacks and silver certificates which is now being made by all the people who are demanding "financial reform."

We have not heard very much of it here, I admit, for it is not a very popular thing to go before the American people and propose the destruction of their paper money, whether it be silver certificates or greenbacks. You are not doing very much loud talking about it, but you are pursuing the same course that those who are doing the talking are pursuing—and every man who votes for this bill knows or ought to know it—and this destruction of these forms of paper money is to be the logical result of its passage. That is why it is being pressed here; and, as I said yesterday, and I repeat it now, I feel from my heart we are surrendering every public declaration made previous to 1896 by the great party now in power. That party has declared that we are incapable of creating our own metallic money, except by the interference and consent of foreign powers, and then we turn over that well-known prerogative of sovereignty, which never ought to be surrendered—the right to make money—to the corporations of the country.

I repeat, Mr. President, that such legislation ought amongst thinking men to bring us into absolute contempt. Talk about removing taxes and the burden of taxation by the adoption of the gold standard, which has afflicted the race now for twenty-five years, and surrender the power to make money to the banks! Mr. President, in the history of the world there is not a nation which has gone to the gold standard which has not reaped from it tribulation and distress. We have suffered something of it ourselves, and we will suffer more from it under this proposed law as time goes on.

The pending bill, I know, is to be crystallized into law. I know when the Republican caucus, composed of Republican members in this body and in the other, said that this was to be the legislation enacted, there was nothing we who oppose it could do here except to enter our protest against it. There was a time in the history of the Republican party when no caucus would have attempted to dominate this Senate, when no caucus would have said to an independent Senator on this floor, "You must follow the majority of this caucus" on a question so vital to the country. I have attended a great many Republican caucuses in the past, and I have heard it again and again stated, "No man is bound by the action of this caucus."

There are men on this floor, Republican Senators, who know this is not a proper bill to be enacted into law, and, uninfluenced by partisan caucuses and partisan force, they would never vote for it. Mr. President, I do not believe the American people will take kindly to the creation of their money by corporations. I believe they think that if paper money is to be issued by anybody the Government of the United States is the proper authority to issue it, for then it would have back of it all the wealth of the nation; it would have back of it the instinct of the American people to do right, to be just, and to maintain the honor of the country in seeing that such money is redeemed at such time as we pledge ourselves to redeem it.

We have seen something of the power of the national banks. Why, Mr. President, within a short time we have seen one of the great banks, through its vice-president, appealing to the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit large sums of the Government moneys in its coffers upon the theory that it or its directors had rendered valuable service during the last campaign to the political party in power. You have not forgotten, sir, I think, the letter sent by Mr. Hepburn to the Secretary of the Treasury. I have it here, and, so that no one may say I misrepresent it, I am going to read it. It ought to have blistered the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury when he received it, because he retained it without rebuke to the man who wrote it—he a man who himself had held a high position in this country as a financial officer in connection with the Treasury. Financial favors to be extended to national banks because they have extended favors to a political organization! I will read the letter, which is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 5, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any changes which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We should like to remain a United States depository, as at present. Of course, the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. HEPBURN.

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE,
United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I do not read that letter with any feeling of pleasure. I am not one of those who would ever willingly and with satisfaction speak ill of those in authority. I like to believe that the American people and the American officials are honest; I like to believe that they pursue proper methods. But here is a letter which ought to have gone back to the man who wrote it with a blistering reply from the Secretary of the Treasury; but it did not. It is put upon the files of the Department. Why? Because subsequent events indicate very strongly that the Secretary of the Treasury intended to comply with that request, and to comply with it as a reward for services rendered in a political campaign.

Mr. President, I have not the language in which to express, and I shall not trust myself to try to express, what I think and feel about such a transaction as that; but when I see bank presidents and Secretaries of the Treasury acting, not in the interests of the American people, but in the way of reward for what some man has done politically, I do not want these banks to get any greater power in this country than they have now; I do not want to see the time when they shall say, as they may, "We will make money dear in this country," or "We will make it cheap." Mr. President, we often hear of the high sense of honor which is said to exist among banking men, but I have no doubt the man who wrote that letter is as much respected and honored as any other man in the banking circles of New York, for what he did the rest of them are doing—they are getting their reward for their support of the political organization now in power.

No, sir, the American people do not want their financial affairs mixed up with politics. They do not want these banks to be able, when an election is coming on, to make money plentiful and again when they want to assist a party in power, as they did in 1893, when they wanted to make odious a statute which had been passed, contract the currency of the country so as to make hard times and bring about certain results. We have not forgotten the aid they rendered Mr. Cleveland in 1893 to produce the memorable financial crisis of that year to secure the repeal of the Sherman law of 1890.

DOES NECESSITY EXIST?

Mr. President, is there any necessity for this legislation at the present time? I asked that question yesterday, and I shall be delighted if any Senator will tell me, beyond the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island, that the bill is to sustain the credit of the United States and ease us of taxation. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether there is any trouble with American credit? Is anybody attacking American credit at this hour in any part of the earth? Is there any other country that can sell its securities at such figures as we can? All our bonds are in price above the bonds of any other country in the world; no one is doubting our solvency or our honesty; and yet we are to have legislation the avowed purpose of which is to strengthen the credit and to remove taxation. The Senator did not tell us how our credit is threatened, nor did he tell us how this bill can possibly relieve us from the burdens of taxation.

I repeat, this legislation is proposed for the purpose of meeting a demand which is made outside of this Chamber, not by the people, but by the money power, to put us upon the gold standard, so that we who are opposed to this policy can not reverse it unless we shall secure control of all three branches of the Government. When it comes to be to the interest of this great banking combination that there shall be no change of the Administration in power, which remembers them in its beneficences when it pays out money, and when it deposits the money of the people in their banks and leaves it there, they will see, by methods which they understand, that no change shall be made.

INTERNATIONAL BIMETALLISM DERIDED.

It will not do for Senators to say that they now hope for bimetallicism by international agreement. That plea has had its day with the Republican organization. It was the shibboleth of the campaign in 1896. When we claimed the Republican party was a gold-standard party they denied it; when we said to them, "You are not in earnest about promoting international bimetallicism," they declared that they were. A question came up in another place in the spring of 1897, before this Administration came into power, as to the construction of the platform at St. Louis. Some gentlemen said it was a gold-standard platform, but distinguished members of this political organization declared then and there that it was not a gold-standard platform, but a bimetallic platform; and in that discussion they quoted the Republican platforms of 1888, of 1892, and of 1896 as proof to those who listened that the Republican party was as a party wedded to bimetallicism.

One gentleman of high prominence in the Republican party—he voted for this House bill—declared that the Republican party was a bimetallic party, and he quoted a provision of the platform of 1896 to prove it. The discussion was on the question of the appointment of a commission to go to Europe. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I thoroughly believe that if this political organization now in power had declared in 1896 that they were for the single gold standard, they would not be in power to-day. This was in 1897. This gentleman—he had been interrupted—said:

I was saying that more than one hundred men who will ornament the next House of Representatives on the Republican side owe their election to that platform and an honest espousal of it before the masses of the people.

He and his associates were then contending that that was a bimetallic platform against those who were contending that it was a gold-standard platform. I know, of course, that the Republican party have claimed that they have done all that can be done in the way of an international agreement. I do not believe they have. I know that a great many people have not much faith in an international agreement. I know we tried it in 1878 and failed. We tried it in 1881 and failed. We tried it in 1892 and failed. We tried it again in 1897, and we failed again, and any man who will take a careful survey of the condition that then existed knows that it was infinitely better for an international agreement in 1897 than it was when either of these other conferences met.

The President of the United States sent a commission consisting of three distinguished gentlemen. I want to bear witness that in my judgment that commission did everything in the power of any three men. I do not attribute to them any dereliction of duty. I believe they went to Europe with the express purpose of procuring an agreement if they could—at least, two of them did; with one of them I did not have the pleasure of personal acquaintance, and therefore I can not speak so thoroughly as to him—but two of them went over hoping, and I do not know but believing, that they could secure some international arrangement touching this difficult question.

But no man familiar with this question could have hoped, could have expected, could have had a shadow of expectation of success unless the commission was strongly and consistently supported by the President. We knew before the commission was dispatched the difficulties we had had in 1878, the difficulties in 1881, and the difficulties in 1892, and that some of them were still existing; and yet it has been recognized ever since we attempted it that in order to succeed the Administration must stand back of the commission and that it must have the hearty support of the Government of the United States. Such support has never been behind any commission up to this hour, and you will never secure an international agreement until you have that kind of support.

The commission went to Europe, and in a little while we began to see in the newspapers reports of the kindly way in which it was received. We knew that the House of Parliament had declared just a short time before that they were much disturbed by the existing relation of gold and silver, and had declared it was the desire of the British Government to secure some kind of an arrangement that would put the two metals in commercial harmony, if possible, or words to that effect. I have the report here, but I do not think it is worth while to read it. We knew also that the Russian Government before that time had, through one of their great conventions of agriculturists, declared—and, it was said at the time, with the approval of the Czar—that they were in favor of going to the bimetallic system. We knew that the President of France was an open and avowed bimetalist and in favor of an international arrangement with us.

I will leave one of the commissioners to tell the tale. We got encouraging news from Europe. The most of us who keep up correspondence with men of like ideas abroad received letters saying, "There is hope over here," and we all felt cheered for a time that possibly the solution of this difficult and important question would be brought about. Nobody begrudged this Administration the credit of the accomplishment if it could bring about general bimetalism. I would have been delighted myself if it could have accomplished it. I could have walked back into that political organization if it could have done that. But it failed. And it failed because this Administration did not intend it should succeed. We know that the Secretary of the Treasury filled the newspapers from the time the commission reached Europe until it acknowledged its failure with declarations in favor of the gold standard. We knew that he had done everything in his power to thwart the purpose for which these men were abroad.

I am going to read the remarks made by my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] on this subject when he returned. Nobody will dispute their correctness:

Here, Mr. President, I should naturally end this account of our negotiations, negotiations which are still pending and undetermined. The extraordinary statements, however, lately made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which, unexplained, must seriously affect the future of any further attempts toward securing international action, require some reference at this time.

When Congress convened on the 6th of last month the President, in his reference to the subject of international bimetalism, spoke earnestly and anxiously of his desire to see an international bimetallic agreement consummated. His assurances gave renewed hope to bimetalists all over the country, and seemed final and conclusive answer to those who had claimed that the President was not in earnest in his efforts toward international bimetalism. For myself, I needed no such proof. I had again and again been made to know how genuine was the President's devotion to this settlement of the vexed question. Within a fortnight after this, with no event meanwhile which would change existing conditions, the Secretary of the Treasury, in support of a bill which he has prepared respecting the currency, said as follows to a committee of Congress:

"The objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:

"1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, all doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad."

The two statements are utterly at variance and contradictory to each other. They can not be reconciled. This is not the proper occasion to analyze the bill of the Secretary. It will reach limbo long before it reaches the Senate. He proposes to capitalize the premium on our bonds sold recently and to make of them, with others to be issued, a security definitely payable in gold.

The Secretary forgets that only a few months ago, when the country was in dire distress, we were compelled to pay $5,000,000 for the privilege of keeping the word "gold" out of some of these very bonds. He ought not to forget, for the bank of which he was president, it was said, got some of the bonds and received some of the proceeds of that deplorable transaction. But I do not intend to discuss the bill which the President's message specifically does not indorse, and it is premature to criticize the Secretary's Republicanism, for his advent into the party and the Cabinet were practically contemporaneous. We must accept the situation.

In my opinion, the great majority of the members of the Republican party are bimetalists, and the fact that they are misrepresented by a Cabinet officer is not pleasing, but it is endurable. The selection of the members of his official household is the President's own affair, and so long as he stands upon the question of bimetalism where he has ever stood there is no serious ground for apprehension. But even in the inconceivable event that the Chief Magistrate of this people should, in the exercise of his judgment, determine to countenance the final fastening upon this country of the burdens of the gold standard, I trust we may still have warrant for faith and hope in the pledges of the party and the wisdom of its counsels.

We will cross our bridges when we come to them. The time when this country will submit to the final imposition of gold monometallism is far away. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the ability of this country to maintain alone the parity between silver and gold, there is no question that the concurrence of other nations would help and not hinder the cause of bimetalism in the United States, and efforts to secure it ought to receive the cordial support of every citizen who is opposed to gold monometallism.

THE PRESIDENT'S PART IN IT.

Mr. President, there was trouble not only with the utterances of the Secretary, but while this commission was negotiating, and at a time, I believe, when, if they had ever had any hope or reason for hope, it then existed in greater degree than at any other time, the President of the United States sent to us a message. I have said I did not believe the Administration wanted this effort to succeed. No man better than I knows that that is a grave charge, a charge that I would not make here or elsewhere for political purposes, and I would not make it if I did not believe the President's action had in a great degree injured the attempt that was being made, and I think was made, for the express purpose of closing that transaction and giving the world to understand that we were going to the gold standard and there intended to remain. This message came to us on the 24th day of July. The House of Representatives had already sent to us a resolution for adjournment.

That resolution was lying on the table of the Committee on Appropriations waiting to be reported, when it should be seen that it could be passed or amended, if necessary, in order that we might adjourn at the time fixed by the House of Representatives. We had been here since the 4th of March. The message of the President of the United States is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message convening the Congress in extraordinary session I called attention to a single subject—that of providing revenue adequate to meet the reasonable and proper expenses of the Government. I believed that to be the most pressing subject for settlement then. A bill to provide the necessary revenues for the Government has already passed the House of Representatives and the Senate and awaits Executive action.

Another question of very great importance is that of the establishment of our currency and banking system on a better basis, which I commented upon in my inaugural address in the following words:

"Our financial system needs some revision; our money is all good now, but its value must not further be threatened. It should all be put upon an enduring basis, not subject to easy attack, nor its stability to doubt or dispute. The several forms of our paper money offer, in my judgment, a constant embarrassment to the Government and imperil a safe balance in the Treasury."

Nothing was settled more clearly at the late national election than the determination upon the part of the people to keep their currency stable in value and equal to that of the most advanced nations of the world.

The soundness of our currency is nowhere questioned. No loss can occur to its holders. It is the system which should be simplified and strengthened, keeping our money just as good as it is now, with less expense to the Government and the people.

The sentiment of the country is strongly in favor of early action by Congress in this direction, to revise our currency laws and remove them from partisan contention. A notable assembly of business men, with delegates from 29 States and Territories, was held at Indianapolis in January of this year. The financial situation commanded their earnest attention, and after a two days' session the convention recommended to Congress the appointment of a monetary commission.

I commend this report to the consideration of Congress. The authors of the report recommend a commission "to make a thorough investigation of the monetary affairs and needs of this country in all relations and aspects, and to make proper suggestions as to any evils found to exist and the remedies therefor."

This subject should receive the attention of Congress at its special session. It ought not to be postponed until the regular session.

I therefore urgently recommend that a special commission be created, non-partisan in its character, to be composed of well-informed citizens of different parties who will command the confidence of Congress and the country because of their special fitness for the work, whose duty it shall be to make recommendations of whatever changes in our present banking and currency laws may be found necessary and expedient, and to report their conclusions on or before the 1st day of November next, in order that the same may be transmitted by me to Congress for its consideration at its first regular session.

It is to be hoped that the report thus made will be so comprehensive and sound as to receive the support of all parties and the favorable action of Congress. At all events, such a report can not fail to be of value to the executive branch of the Government, as well as to those charged with public legislation, and to greatly assist in the establishment of an improved system of finance.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 26, 1897.

The world knew that the convention at Indianapolis had declared in the most emphatic terms possible for the gold standard and that they had recommended a commission for the purpose of securing legislation to establish the gold standard. In view of this fact was not the President's message equivalent to a declaration to the world that we intended to go to the gold standard? I state what is a fact, and, if necessary, I could call upon the members of the commission, and I could call upon plenty of men who are not members, when I say that from that hour there was no longer any interest on the part of Great Britain in this financial question with relation to international agreement. Two weeks later a report came concerning the Indian affairs, which had been held in abeyance for many months to see what might come out of this conference, declaring that India was to be put upon the gold standard. I do not like to comment upon this message very much, and yet I can not see why the President sent it to us unless he wanted to give notice to the world that the Republican party hereafter would be for the gold standard and not for bimetalism.

I remember some utterances of his and words that he sent through his friends to people in distant sections that he would "keep the promises he had made," and that they were construed everywhere into a declaration that he intended to establish the gold standard. The promises which his party had made were that they would maintain the condition of affairs which then existed, and that they would go on and promote bimetalism by an international agreement. Does anybody think that the course of the Administration was calculated to promote international bimetalism?

Mr. ALLISON. What does the President mean when he says he hopes the commission will recommend legislation that will meet the approval of all parties?

Mr. TELLER. The President of the United States could not have hoped that a commission appointed in the way that this was to be appointed could ever submit a measure that would meet the approval of everybody. Certainly not if it was to establish the gold standard. The Senator from Iowa, with his long experience, knows that no financial bill could be brought here that would meet the approval of everybody.

International bimetalism is abandoned. You will hear nothing of it unless it be at the beginning of the campaign next year for the purpose of deluding the voters, as we heard it in 1896. Mr. President, immediately after the close of the last election one of the great newspapers of New York announced that "it was time to be honest." I supposed I had the verbatim quotation, but I have mislaid it, apparently. I can not put my hand on it for the moment. It announced that it was now time to be honest and to stop fooling with international bimetalism, that the international bimetalism clause had been put in the platform to catch votes, and now that the election was over the proper thing was just to repudiate the whole thing. That seems to have been the attitude of a good many others than that newspaper. I think the utterance represents the position of a good many people, I am sorry to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to remind him that the President, previous to the time under consideration, influenced a Democratic House to repeal the Sherman law, and that a Democratic Congressman from Maryland said the Chicago platform of 1893, which those of us who were present said was a bimetallic platform, was good enough to be elected on, but was not worth a snap afterwards? Perhaps our Republican friends learned the same trick.

Mr. TELLER. I should say they did.

DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

Now, Mr. President, there has been a good deal said in the country, and I will not spend much time on it, about the act of 1853 demonetizing silver. I have heard a great many men say it did. I have seen the statement in a great many newspapers. The act of 1853 simply changed our financial system as respects the small money; it dealt with the half dollars and quarters and took out some of the silver and reduced the extent of the legal-tender quality of some of the coins. That is all it did. We had found that up to that time there was too much silver in our subsidiary money, or just as much in two half dollars as in a dollar, and they had been legal tender; but the enactment of that year took about 6 cents' worth out of each half dollar, I think, or something in that neighborhood.

Mr. ALLISON. It reduced the value 7 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. Seven per cent. I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the act was passed February 21, 1853. But in March, 1853, a few days later, another act was passed. That act is practically an unlimited coinage act. It provided for the silver being refined and taken to the mint and mint certificates being given before it was coined into dollars, and it is not possible to torture that into a demonetization of silver. It was said in another place that the debate indicated a desire to get rid of silver. I do not think that contention can be sustained anywhere. I do not think anybody has any proof that anyone in that transaction supposed he was disturbing the silver dollar itself.

I shall not attempt to-night to say some things which yesterday I said I wanted to say about "unrealized prophecies." I will take occasion to say what I wanted to say on that point some other day, because it is not absolutely essential to this debate. I know we made some prophecies that have not altogether come true, but we will offset them. We will put them against all the prophecies our friends ever have made from time to time as to the danger of the use of silver, none of which came true.

WHY CHANGE?

But, Mr. President, I wish to ask a question here, and then I believe I will conclude for the present. I wish to ask Senators who advocate this bill and say it is a good time now for us to change our financial system if it is not a fact that at this time, whether it is not true, that with all the great output of gold in this country and in the world in the last few years, that in the whole history of mankind there has ever been a greater struggle for gold than is going on right now; and is it not to be assumed that this struggle must continue if we go to a gold standard and make gold the only money in use in this country except bank paper, which, of course, is not international money.

Mr. President, the Bank of England is the great financial regulator, perhaps, of Europe. It is not so great a bank in some respects as the Bank of France, but it has had, perhaps, a greater influence on the affairs of mankind than the Bank of France. A writer not long since said that whenever the Bank of England made money dear money was dear all over the world, and I think there is some truth in that statement.

Now, what has been the condition of the Bank of England—that is, the great commercial center of the world to-day? It has recently raised its rate of discount from 5 to 6, and threatens to raise it to 7. There is every reason to suppose that it may be compelled to do so. Why? Because a few hundred thousand dollars of gold were drawn out of its coffers for use somewhere else. The Bank of France has raised its rate of discount twice within a very short time, a proceeding very unusual for the Bank of France, simply to prevent the export of gold. The banks of Russia have raised their discount to 10 and 15 per cent, and Russia, with her great stock of gold, has not yet fully established the gold standard.

Now, Mr. President, other countries have attempted to go to the gold standard besides ours. Russia has attempted to go to the gold standard; Austria has attempted to go to the gold standard; the Argentine Republic has attempted to go to the gold standard; Chile, Brazil, and Japan. In a letter written in 1898 Dr. Giffin, who is the most notable of all the gold advocates of Europe, declared that all those countries had failed to establish the gold standard. The public press tell us that Chile is about to return to her silver standard because she can not maintain the gold standard. And this, too, notwithstanding the output of gold in the last three years has been greater than it was for one hundred and fifty years after the discovery of America.

What is our own condition? If the Treasury Department is correct, we have more than one-fifth of the world's gold. And yet we are in financial distress. There was recently a panic in New York, the Secretary of the Treasury says, to such an extent that he was compelled to offer to take in $25,000,000 of bonds, and he paid out for bonds $21,000,000. Not only that, but so great was the disturbance of financial affairs in this country that the Secretary of the Treasury has put into the national banks of this country for their use, to keep up the prices and to maintain the commercial equilibrium, I believe somewhere in the neighborhood of $120,000,000. He had $94,000,000 in the banks not long since, and he has been putting in ever since, and I have seen in the public press that the sum amounts to $120,000,000. He expressed his determination to put in, in addition to what was in, when there were eighty-odd millions, at least $40,000,000 more.

A commercial condition that requires boosting up by the Treasury Department is a bad one, and if a people with nearly one-fourth of the world's gold are in extremis, what will we be if there should be a demand upon us, as there may be, for a large share of that gold which we now hold? We certainly hold more than our share. No nation in the world has ever been able to hold for any great length of time any more of the bullion money of the world than her share. France comes nearer to doing this than any other nation, and she has had a struggle from time to time to hold her gold in her treasury or in the Bank of France. With financial disturbance in France, in England, in Austria, in Germany, in Russia, in Roumania, Mr. President, it does not seem to be a good time to go to the gold standard and stake everything upon one money metal and that the money metal that the world is struggling for. Of course we may continue to have this great output of gold; I trust we may; but we ought to remember that $400,000,000 next year will not have the same influence upon the commerce of the world that $150,000,000 had in former years. The influence of the yearly output is determined by the mass against which it goes.

THE WORLD'S GOLD OUTPUT.

When Columbus discovered America the world was devoid of money metals, and a few millions of money coming in was a great percentage on the world's stock. Now the world's stock is between nine and ten thousand million dollars of gold and silver. Then, when there is a great output of gold and silver, it is a trifling percentage of the great stock, and its influence is slight. Reduce it one-half, destroy the silver, and then the silver that comes out has its influence in no part of the Christian world as a money metal, and the gold that comes out is left to have its influence upon the gold of Christendom alone. If we have four thousand six hundred million dollars of gold in Christendom, I will say, $400,000,000 is but a trifling percentage on it, but its effect is greater than it would be on all the silver and gold together.

It is a well-known fact that as the quantity of gold increases so the demand for it increases. Money is the only thing in the world for which a superabundance or oversupply increases the demand. An excess of wheat or corn or cotton or of any of the commodities of life tends to lower their price. Money, on the contrary, when that comes in excess, creates a commercial activity, and this increases the demand for it. That again begets a further demand for money. Such is the history of the world. If $400,000,000 comes from the mines next year—and I would not be surprised if it does, and I hope it will—that sum will be absorbed in the channels of trade and commerce without financial disturbance, except to the extent that it lowers the purchasing power, or, on the other hand, putting it the other way, to the extent that it raises prices, which I believe will be a great blessing to mankind.

But we do not know how long this increased supply of gold may continue. We are going to a financial system that will outlive, perhaps, this great output of gold. We saw in 1858 and 1859 the whole world upset because there was one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty million dollars of gold that came into circulation in a single year, because California put upon the markets $60,000,000 of gold. We heard not only in Europe but in the United States men predicting that gold would be too cheap for money, and some contracts were made in the United States and in Europe for payment in silver. Some of them exist in New England to-day and are being paid in silver by weight.

If it had not been for the action of France, which accepted all the gold that came to her mint and resisted the efforts of leading men who declared that she ought to demonetize gold, prices measured in gold would have risen much beyond what they did, and the purchasing power of gold would have been 50 per cent of what it had been. Yet Senators will tell us that gold is a stable metal and that a dollar of it is always of the same value.

Mr. President, nobody need be alarmed about the great output of gold. It is a blessing to mankind. We have some prosperity now. We owe it to the fact that gold has increased in a degree that nobody expected. Our financial condition is not better than that of some parts of Europe. You talk about prosperity here and say that the Administration brought it. Who brought it to the greater part of Europe? Conditions are infinitely better now than they were five years ago in Europe. We boast of our great production of commodities. The entire world is now manufacturing more of everything than it ever manufactured before in its history. We talk about the great output of iron in this country. Why, Mr. President, the European countries are keeping pace with us proportionately in the growth of iron and steel industries, although they do not quite come up to us in the prices, simply because we have a great combination that fixes the price of iron and steel in this country. Russia has increased her product of iron in a greater per cent than we have ours. England maintains her output in proportion to ours.

GOOD TIMES AND THE VOLUME OF MONEY.

Mr. President, this gold that comes out and enters into the channels of trade is doing what we declared it would do when we said there was not money enough in the country to do the business with. Having increased our stock of money in this country to a very large extent, we can see the impetus that is given to business, and it would have come to us if Mr. Bryan had been elected, or Mr. Smith, or any other man. No political organization has a right to stand before the American people and say, "This prosperity comes by our agency." You can not point out anything that you have done that brings it to us. Does your tariff create this great export of commodities? Nobody will pretend that it does. I do not mean to say that I do not think a tariff is a wise and beneficial thing properly laid. I do so believe, and I believe that the tariff may sometimes change conditions very materially.

But, Mr. President, this is not a local or national change only. I repeat, there is not a country in Christendom that has not felt the stimulating and life-giving influence of this great output of gold, and all will continue to feel it, I hope. Times would have been equally good if silver had been recognized as a money metal for some years by the world. We would have been getting the benefit of the great product of that metal, not at 50 cents on a dollar, but at its old mint rate. A great production of silver has the same effect on commerce and trade that a great production of gold has.

There are many other things that I hope to say before this debate is over, but I will not attempt to say them now. I do, however, want to say another word that comes properly in this connection. I adverted to the condition of the Bank of England. I wish to say what I should have said when I was touching upon it. Within the last two months the Bank of England seriously proposed shutting off all discounts for the purpose of holding her gold. She only refrained from doing so, an English periodical says, when the brokers who make loans in London, fearing a panic, went to the bank officials and said, "If you close your discounts, we will close ours." Then what happens? The bank will have to shut up. Then the bank reconsidered the matter. Now, Mr. President, with that condition of the world, I repeat, we ought not to be going to any new experiments and trying this standard when things are well enough here at home, or, if not good enough, better than they have for some time been, and better than, I believe, they will be under this bill when it becomes a law and its full effect as such is felt.

GOLD STANDARD IN INDIA.

England has been trying to put India upon the gold standard. She commenced that process actively immediately after the failure of the last international conference. She had been sending some gold there and tying up some in the Bank of England for the purpose of getting India on that standard. The result has been just as it was when they closed the mint in 1893. Soon after that there came a famine, which my colleague on this floor [Mr. Wolcott] properly characterized as not a food famine but a money famine. And all Europe admitted that it was a money famine. There is another famine in India. It is another money famine, Mr. President; it is not a food famine.

My colleague in the remarks he made when he came back from Europe stated that there were a thousand million ounces of silver held by the natives of India in spangles and bangles and trinkets, which I think is not an exaggeration. I myself, from an examination I made many years ago and from the testimony of some who know something about it, think the quantity is even greater than that. A thousand million ounces of silver are worth in India money with open mints $1.38 an ounce, as they have the ratio of gold to silver of 1 to 15.

Heretofore, up to the last famine, up to 1893, when there was a stringency of food, the men who had silver bullion or silver ornaments took their silver to the mint, got rupees for it, and bought food for their families. Their wealth, their savings, consist in these silver trinkets that I have mentioned. When they want to convert them into money they go to the Indian broker and sell them, and formerly they did this, or went to the mint with them and got rupees for them.

Now, since the mints have been closed they sell to the Indian broker for whatever he is willing to pay. If he offers them an insufficient price, they must take what he will pay, as the mints are closed.

Probably in the whole history of brokerages and purchases of that kind there are no people who are more intolerant in their dealings than those Indian brokers. So the poor, ignorant native, heretofore considering his spangles and bangles the same as money, goes to the broker, and the broker says that the silver in them is not worth $1.38 an ounce; it is worth 50 cents or 45 cents or 40 cents, or whatever he thinks the man will part with it for.

So, Mr. President, those people are selling those things for less than a third of what they would have sold them for, and their consuming capacity and supporting capacity is destroyed to the extent of two-thirds.

Yet, sir, we are told again and again that commerce settles all these questions and that law means nothing when it touches money. Why, law cut those people out of two-thirds of their holdings as certainly as you would have done here if you had taken out of the banks in this country two-thirds of the cash deposits and appropriated them to your own use. There are starving and distress in India because the interest of British capital is considered instead of the interest of the people of India.

AMOUNT OF GOLD IN CIRCULATION.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. One of the questions which seem to me to make the adoption or rejection of gold monometallism, as proposed by this bill, almost a moral question is the damage done to the people of the silver-using nations of India and China by the destruction of their values, which have been values in those countries almost from the foundation of the world. The Senator from Colorado is presenting that view of the case.

I have never said anything about "the crime of 1873," because I have thought the stoppage of silver coinage in the United States at that time was an accident and not intentional; but I am inclined to think that the deliberate reduction by England, aided by the United States, of the values of the silver coins and the silver hoards in the Orient is almost a crime, an offense against morality—for a great economic question may have a moral side to it.

Now, the injury done to the poor people of the Orient depends very much upon the quantity of silver coin and silver bullion which there is in those countries. The Senator from Colorado has made some statements as to the amounts. I have previously made some statements in this body as to the amounts. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wolcott], now absent, made estimates in a speech to which the senior Senator has referred.

All this is preliminary to a question. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado whether his attention has been called to the fact that the present Director of the Mint in his report for last year has largely reduced the quantities of silver in India from previous estimates, and that if he is correct the amounts are not nearly so large as we have thought they were, and consequently the damage done by demonetization is not so large. Has the Senator's attention been called to those reduced estimates? If so, what does he think about them?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is diverting me from what I was saying, except that I made a statement as to the amount of silver in India.

Mr. President, I do not rely upon statistics presented by the Treasury Department. I found in one report that the amount of gold in circulation in Great Britain was placed at $584,000,000. I thought then that there was not a man in the country who touched statistics who did not know that that statement was untrue. There had been a great discussion going on in England for some years as to the volume of the gold in circulation, and some of the scientists of Great Britain, men who dealt with economic questions, have declared that instead of there being about five hundred millions, as had been claimed, there was less than $400,000,000. Nobody, I think, claimed above $500,000,000. That is about the amount at which it was generally stated.

The last report of the Director of the Mint has corrected that error, and instead of placing the amount as $584,000,000 it is given at $438,000,000. Here was $146,000,000 more gold said to be in Great Britain last year than is now reported there. When I made an investigation in order to ascertain whether Great Britain had been importing or exporting gold, I found she had a net import of gold since the report of $584,000,000 was made, and still she now has only $438,000,000. When it was claimed she had $580,000,000 she did not have $400,000,000. A distinguished firm of scientists has declared that she did not have more than $380,000,000.

I can find many other errors in all of the reports, and many errors as great as these in the statistics which come to us from the Treasury Department. I do not remember the amount of silver which they have given as being used in France. If you take the official report, I venture to say you will find it does not give half the amount of silver that is in circulation in France. Can the Senator from New Hampshire give me the last report of the mint on the amount of silver in France?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not the table here.

Mr. TELLER. Never mind; these erroneous statements have been repeated from time to time for three or four years. France has not been exporting silver. She has been holding her silver steadily, and it is performing money duty. She can not afford to export it, and she does not; but it serves the purpose of the Treasury Department in their statement to cut the amount down, and that has been done.

In 1887, or about that time, the minister from this country to France reported that we usually said that France had $800,000,000 of silver, whereas he stated that France had more than one thousand million dollars of silver in circulation. If she had it then, she has it now. Authorities which are recognized everywhere say she has $150,000,000 of silver coin belonging to the members of the Latin Union, which circulates in France, which she can at any time call upon them to pay her for in gold; but she does not do it because she does not want to make the scramble for gold greater than it has been. I have no doubt there are one thousand million ounces of silver in India which is not in money.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kansas has informed me that in asking a question I had used the word "gold" when I intended to use the word "silver." I think the estimates of the Director of the Mint, which are soon to be printed, reduce the estimate of the quantity of silver in India to something like $650,000,000.

In an article in the New York Tribune of February 8, 1897, signed "I. N. F.," Mr. Ford, describing the condition at that time of the Indian peasantry, says:

Sir Lepel Griffin states, on the authority of Mr. Lesley Probyn, that the amount of silver in the possession of the Indian peasantry in the form of ornaments is 1,312,500,000 ounces.

Of course, at $1.29 an ounce that would be more than $1,500,000,000 in ornaments. Now, the estimate which the Director of the Mint makes is that there is only $650,000,000 of silver in all India. How does the Senator account for that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Colorado will permit, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] whether that estimate is upon a gold basis or upon a coinage basis of 16 to 1?

Mr. CHANDLER. The coinage basis.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Colorado what pertinency that has to the pending bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state now, if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will allow me, that the question of destroying silver as a money metal is very pertinent when there is a bill before the Senate to establish gold monometallism in this country.

INTEGRITY OF THE STATISTICAL AUTHORITIES.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say that the Director of the Mint in his report always gives the sources of his information. I do not suppose he has any means of counting or enumerating the bangles and other silver ornaments worn throughout India, and therefore he can only make the best possible estimate; but inasmuch as he gives the sources of his information and how he reaches his conclusions, I think he ought to have at least credit for integrity.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not impugned the integrity of the Director of the Mint. The Senator did not understand me to do so. The table which he gives in his report is accompanied by a letter, and I think his estimate is $650,000,000 of silver in India, as against $900,000,000 of a year or two ago in the report then made. I think it says that this estimate is obtained from the United States consuls. Whether the full report explains more in detail where he gets his new amount I do not know, but I do know that the effort is being made to reduce the estimate of the quantity of silver money and silver ornaments in India.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems that the Director of the Mint has also made an effort to reduce the estimate of the quantity in Great Britain, so that he seems to be impartial in the matter.

Mr. TELLER. I will not say that the Director of the Mint purposely misstated that there was $584,000,000 of gold in England, but either he is not the man who ought to make estimates in regard to these matters or else he has been misinformed. I think it likely he did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not make any such accusation as that. I found several errors in one of his tables, and I called them to his attention. He has explained them satisfactorily to me, and I make no imputation against him. I think Mr. Roberts is endeavoring to arrive at the truth; but there is a great deal of uncertainty about the quantities of gold and silver in the form of money, in the form of bullion, and in the form of ornaments in this world of ours. I ask the Senator from Iowa how much gold there is in India, according to his understanding of the case?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the figures before me, but I know there is a very large amount of gold in India held in the same way that silver is held, in the form of bangles, ornaments, etc.

Mr. CHANDLER. The best we can do is to get what information we can from the most reliable sources; and I am not imputing dishonesty to any statistician.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as the personal agency of the Director of the Mint has been brought into question, I think it is but fair I should read what he said about the stock of money in England. It seems no more than just that I should do so.

The estimate $584,000,000 as the stock of gold in the United Kingdom December 31, 1896, as published in the fiscal report for 1897, was based upon information contained in Money and Prices, published under the auspices of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department.

An American source—

The estimate of $438,000,000, now made, is based upon official information received from the British Government.

My recollection now is, in looking it up, that I found that between the time he reported the amount at $584,000,000 and the time that the statement was made the net imports of gold by Great Britain were $113,000,000. I had not intended to touch upon this question. There was not only an error there, but there was an error regarding other countries.

Roumania's stock of gold estimated upon official information at $38,000,000 December 31, 1896.

Now it is estimated at $14,500,000. Here is a reduction of $24,000,000 in Roumania.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator is referring to the report of 1897, giving estimates and statements derived from various sources, which are stated in the report. I make this statement so that no imputation of ignorance or lack of ability may be cast on the present Director of the Mint or his predecessor.

Mr. TELLER. I was quite aware that the present Director did not make these estimates. My remarks referred to the man who made them. I want to go a little further. The report proceeds:

For the stock of gold in Egypt, as published in previous reports, $129,300,000 was the estimate of the late Ottomar Haupt, an eminent statistician of France—

He was about the only gold-standard statistician France has had for some years. This man, who is now dead, was a very ardent gold-standard man—but from unofficial information there is substantial reason for the belief that Haupt's estimate was far too great, and it is now placed at $30,000,000.

Here is an error of $99,000,000 more in Egypt. I repeat what I said about England. Any man who has kept in touch with the finances of the world ought to have known there was not $130,000,000 of gold in that country, any more than there is $4,000,000 of gold in the Hawaiian Islands, as now stated by the Director of the Mint. This figure would give $40 per capita in those islands. The statement is perfectly absurd. Here is an error of $146,000,000 in Great Britain, an error of $24,000,000 in Roumania, and one of $99,000,000 in Egypt. The aggregate is a pretty large sum.

This calculation is made upon the amount of gold there is in the world; and when we say there is not gold enough to do the business of the world, we are answered there is so much gold here and so much there. I think these estimates are in very many cases made because the parties have a scheme or a position to maintain. You will find, if you look over these different estimates, that I will be borne out in the assertions I have made.

Mr. President, I shall leave that subject. I mentioned India. I wish to have inserted in the RECORD an article I intended to read and comment upon, which appeared in the Financial News of January 3, 1900, written by Mr. Moreton Frewen, who is well known to most of us. The article is on the condition in India and the suffering there. It is a very interesting presentation. It makes a pathetic picture, and I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

INDIAN FAMINE AND INDIAN MINTS—"STARVATION BY LEGISLATION"—THE NEW DRAIN OF GOLD TO THE EAST AND THE BANK RATE.

[By Moreton Frewen.]

A serious famine has again overtaken some millions of our fellow-subjects in India, and the public are appealed to for funds to assist the government of India to fulfill its duties. What is wanted is not food, but money to buy food. Thanks to the liberal railway policy of the past fifteen years, supplies can be obtained from districts within India which enjoy a surplus, in order to feed sufferers within the famine areas. It was the same with the famine of two years since. Lord George Hamilton asked our community for money subscriptions—for cash and not for kind—on the ground that there was no real scarcity of food anywhere, but that money was sorely needed. The official figures, published a little later, showed that he was right and that in the worst famine districts the price of a pound of rice was at no time so high as the price of a pound of wheat in London.

It would not be becoming to mince matters merely to avoid ruffling the susceptibilities of official vivisectionists, and I wish to be permitted to record my conviction that the closing of the Indian mints by our Government is murder. With mints closed, whenever there is a local scarcity, whether in the Deccan, the Punjab, or elsewhere, while individuals will starve to death, vast numbers of people are going to suffer horribly, and this reduced vitality makes them the easy victims of the ordinary Indian fevers. When we accuse official India of this odious crime, one official and then another gets up and splutters rage and denial; but not one of these has ever found any reasoned reply to our repeated statement that the closing of the mint involves the death, after cruel suffering, of our fellow-subjects and that their real famine reserve fund, accumulated during centuries, is in their ornaments and their hoards of silver bullion.

Let me once again quote the evidence of an eyewitness, Mr. Forbes Mitchell, a well-known Calcutta merchant. Mr. Mitchell wrote to me during the last famine that he had seen a peasant from one of the worst famine districts arrive in Allahabad with bangles and other ornaments which, had the mints been open, would have coined into 1,980 rupees; but the mints were closed, and accordingly this poor man had to part with his little hoard of uncoined silver for 600 rupees; so that the closing of the mints took from this one man 1,380 rupees and reduced this famine fund, in a village where people were dying of starvation, by just that amount. Does this justify my assertion that this precious scheme of tampering with the Indian silver currency is murder; and if it does not, then why not? And so I ask why we here are to subscribe these 1,380 rupees, when the government of India can itself subscribe them by merely opening its mints and coining them, and why again we are to put our hands in our pockets, not to help people who, with mints open, are well able to help themselves, but that we may prolong the life of a currency experiment which is not merely unscientific, but is shamefully immoral—is an experiment in human suffering?

Well did Mr. David Yule, the president of the Bank of Calcutta, declare of this amazing trick, "Enforced scarcity of money is the only hope on which the famine-begging gold standard depends. To become wealthy the government of India is endeavoring to render itself and its trading community destitute." Such, then, is the position; we are once again being asked to give our sovereigns for these poor Indian sufferers. But let us watch what happens if we do. The sovereign goes to Calcutta, is there exchanged for 15 rupees, and, together with 5,000,000 more sovereigns, is thereupon locked up in a "war chest," never to appear again; they remain to look well on paper and to help to maintain a bogus confidence in this precious gold-standard experiment. Five million sovereigns have in this way been grabbed and stowed away in Calcutta; no turn of the exchanges can bring them back to the life of trade; for the want of these 5,000,000 sovereigns, which would naturally be here irrigating the ducts and the drying water courses of our trades, our bank rate, which would be 4 per cent, is now 6 per cent, while every industry in the country is to be pinched of necessary accommodation.

In an admirable leader, on December 18, on the "Scramble for gold," and on the reserves of gold in the Bank of England and in the chief banks of the Continent, that excellent monometallic organ the Scotsman says:

"The chances are that it (the period of stringency) will be much more prolonged than has been anticipated up till now. The natural cure for such a situation is, of course, a lessening of the pressure at present borne by the existing supplies—in other words, a contraction of trade. This is an eventuality which has now to be prepared for as the only healthy solution of a problem that has been sprung upon us."

Currency, in short, is not the handmaid of commerce; but commerce is the handmaid of the currency. The incumbent must be lopped or must be lengthened to fit the bed Procrustes has designed for him.

The Scotsman next proceeds to point out that while in the Bank of France the gold reserve is £250,000 larger than a year since, yet its discounts and advances are £7,300,000 higher, while its note issues are £8,600,000 higher. The Imperial Bank of Germany holds £2,500,000 less gold than it did a year since; it has £8,300,000 more of loans and discounts and a larger note circulation by £1,000,000. "The banks of Russia, Belgium, and Italy are in the same case with the Imperial Bank of Germany." Is it possible, under these conditions of acute pressure, that the government of India is to be permitted to lock up a further 5,000,000, 10,000,000, 20,000,000, 50,000,000 sovereigns in order to starve both her citizens and our industries? And do we recall the situation of this prodigious currency experiment? The responsible officials of the government of India, Sir James Westland at their head, proposed a currency scheme which left us all betwixt laughter and tears.

Not a shred or tatter of this preposterous scheme was permitted to survive the inquiry; it was laughed out of court. But, lo! a committee is appointed by the secretary of state for India, which committee devises a brand-new scheme of its own, and it is this precious scheme of half a dozen ex-statesmen from India, with a London exporting merchant or two thrown in, which to-day is permitted to tamper with the currency of 300,000,000 people over there, and, indeed, with the currency of 40,000,000 people here. It is not an official, a responsible, scheme at all; it is the creation of a number of amiable amateurs in contraction, who were selected by the secretary of state because of their alleged impartiality; in other words, because, never having learned anything about currency, they had the loss to forget.

Let me refer the Indian government, struggling to-day with famine, to an interesting analogy. At the session of the Agricultural Congress of the Nine Governments of Central Russia, at Orel, in May of last year, M. Georges Boutmy, of Odessa, said of Russia's variation from her silver standard:

"During the five years which preceded the famine of the year 1897-98 Russia exported 508,000,000 poods more and obtained in exchange 84,000,000 roubles less than during the five years which preceded the famine of the year 1891-92. If we had kept our legitimate silver standard, these 508,000,000 poods of food and 84,000,000 roubles, lost to us through the gold standard, would have been saved to us and would have sufficed to have spared Russia the frightful famine which devastated actually 19 provinces, with a population of 80,000,000, cruelly decimated by the typhus and by the scurvy, those satellites of famine. The famine of 1901 claimed 656,000 human victims.

These hundreds of thousands of men, who were swept off by actual famine, are the human sacrifices, sacrificed to the golden calf by the fanaticism of its worshippers."

M. Boutmy proceeds to show that as the result of the famine of 1891 no less than 78 per cent of the men recruited for the army were found to be "incapables."

Because of the experiments of the Indian government the gold question to-day transcends in importance all other questions. If India, in place of drawing her trade balances in silver, is for the future to draw them in gold, the drain of gold to the East is certain to keep the European and American money markets in a perpetual state of irritation and unrest. In February of last year, under the heading, "The coming drain of gold to India,"—a drain which has in the interval already doubled our money rates, although still in its infancy—you permitted me to lay before your readers these figures, which let me repeat. I then wrote (February 1, 1899):

"That anyone with the figures disclosed by Mr. Goschen's silver committee of 1875 can placidly contemplate a drain of gold to India, instead of a drain of silver, passes all comprehension. The report of 1875 shows that between the years 1848 and 1874 the aggregate trade balance in favor of India was no less than £511,000,000 sterling, a sum largely in excess of all the gold which came during those years from California and Australia combined. Recall that this drain to India was to a much smaller population, with far less facilities for export than to-day. To switch off, then, by our own legislation, the specie hunger of these myriads and to substitute for a demand for silver a demand for gold—truly a change so revolutionary promises in the next century such a catastrophe as may involve all national debts."

Emerging from the age of steam, we stand to-day upon the threshold of the electrical age. Our manufacturing supremacy in the coming years will depend upon vast conversions. Very probably, indeed, the ocean tides at our doors may be destined to give us the motive power we have derived in the past century from cheap coal, and may protect us against the competition of the cheap pauper labor of the far east. But the harnessing of the tides will require an almost incalculable expenditure, and upon the fact that we can borrow at cheaper rates than our foreign competitors our commercial victory may depend. To choose such a time, then, to start a drain of gold to the East is suicidal; and yet this is exactly what is now going forward in full sight of all men. Your Calcutta correspondent, in the letter you published last Thursday, showed that during the single month of November the Indian government had commandeered 8,600,000 rupees of gold from Australia and Japan—say £200,000. In addition to which they had earmarked, and thus taken out of the market, some £250,000 in gold, which sum is now lying in the Bank of England.

It is safe to say that the exploitation of our money market by the Indian government has already ruined scores of traders here and in America, traders who are even now ignorant of the cause which has led to their disaster; and I am sure that the estimate is no whit overstated that the appropriation of only 5,000,000 sovereigns for Calcutta has written down the value of securities in London and New York by fully £100,000,000 sterling. And all this crime and confusion for what? For a half-baked project that is not merely immoral, but which every intelligent student of currency conditions knows will eke out not more than a year or two of life, but which will entail for all time our discredit abroad and our disaster at home.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I believe I shall close for the present. I may take occasion to deliver some further observations to-morrow or on some subsequent day.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it is not the desire of the Senator from Colorado to proceed to-morrow, and if no other Senator then wishes to occupy the floor, I shall move that the Senate adjourn until Monday; but if that Senator or any other Senator desires to go on to-morrow, I shall not make the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I should prefer that the Senate would not adjourn over to-morrow for several reasons.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. TELLER. I think I shall not consider my speech concluded, but shall merely suspend for the time being.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator reserves his right to the floor?

Mr. TELLER. I reserve my right to go on at a later day.

AGREEMENT WITH BANNOCK AND SHOSHONE INDIANS.

Mr. SHOUP. Yesterday I called up the bill (S. 255) to ratify an agreement made with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation in Idaho and making appropriation to carry the same into effect. The bill was in process of being read at the hour of 2 o'clock, when it was laid aside for the purpose of taking up the regular order. I now request that the bill be taken up and concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have an executive session; and I inquire of the Senator whether the bill will occupy any more time than will be required for its reading?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Idaho wants to have the bill passed.

Mr. SHOUP. I think there will be no discussion regarding the bill. I desire to have it passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator had better let the bill go over until to-morrow. It is now almost 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHOUP. I give notice, then, Mr. President, that after the completion of the morning business to-morrow I shall call up the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 19, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 18, 1900.

FIRST LIEUTENANT IN REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Second Lieut. Preston H. Uberroth, of Pennsylvania, to be a first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed George E. McConnell, promoted. Mr. Uberroth is now serving under a temporary commission issued during the recess of the Senate.

SECOND LIEUTENANTS IN REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Third Lieut. Abert H. Buhner, of California, to be a second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed A. R. Hasson, resigned. Mr. Buhner is now serving under a temporary commission issued during the recess of the Senate.

Third Lieut. John Mel, of California, to be a second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Preston H. Uberroth, promoted. Mr. Mel is now serving under a temporary commission issued during the recess of the Senate.

POSTMASTERS.

William C. Campbell, to be postmaster at Los Gatos, in the county of Santa Clara and State of California, in the place of Josephine J. Gaffney, whose commission expires March 13, 1900.
Franklin W. Rollins, to be postmaster at Ellsworth, in the county of Hancock and State of Maine, in the place of H. H. Harden, whose commission expires February 11, 1900.

CIVILIAN MEMBER OF BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

Thomas J. Henderson, of Illinois, as civilian member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, vice Joseph H. Outhwaite, resigned.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY—INFANTRY ARM.

To be second lieutenants, to rank from January 1, 1900.

Davis C. Anderson, of Ohio, now serving as second lieutenant, Fortieth Infantry, United States Volunteers.
Robert D. Carter, of the District of Columbia.
Douglas Potts, of the District of Columbia, now serving as private, Troop C, Fourth Cavalry, United States Army.

TRANSFER IN THE ARMY.

Second Lieut. Arthur S. Cowan, from the infantry arm to the cavalry arm, January 12, 1900, with rank from February 16, 1899.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE VOLUNTEER ARMY—ELEVENTH CAVALRY.

To be second lieutenants, to rank from August 12, 1899.

Sergt. Maj. Dennis P. Quinlan, Eleventh Cavalry, United States Volunteers.
Private Otto W. Rethorst, Eleventh Cavalry, United States Volunteers.
Henry C. White, jr., of Ohio.
James D. Keene, of the District of Columbia.

[NOTE.—The above-named persons were nominated to the Senate December 6, 1899, and confirmed December 20, 1899. This message is to correct errors in the dates of rank of the nominees.]

COMMANDER ON RETIRED LIST.

Commander Augustus G. Kellogg, United States Navy, retired, to be a commander on the retired list of the Navy on account of incapacity resulting from long and faithful service, and from sickness and exposure therein, as provided in section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SECOND LIEUTENANT IN MARINE CORPS.

John G. Muir, a citizen of the District of Columbia, to be a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps, from the 13th day of January, 1900, to fill a vacancy existing in that corps.

PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS IN THE NAVY.

William S. Eichelberger, a citizen of Connecticut, to be a professor of mathematics in the Navy, from the 15th day of January, 1900, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade.

ASSISTANT PAYMASTERS IN THE NAVY.

George W. Reeves, jr., a citizen of New Jersey, and Walter T. Camp, a citizen of Connecticut.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 18, 1900.

CONSUL.

Robert W. McWade, of Pennsylvania, to be consul of the United States at Canton, China.

MEMBER OF BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

Thomas J. Henderson, of Illinois, to be civilian member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification.

SURVEYOR-GENERAL.

Eli S. Warner, of St. Paul, Minn., to be surveyor-general of Minnesota.

ASSAYERS.

Charles H. Sherman, of California, to be assayer of the mint of the United States at San Francisco, Cal.
Roswell K. Colcord, of Nevada, to be assayer in charge of the mint of the United States at Carson, Nev.

INDIAN AGENT.

J. Blair Shoenfelt, of Douglas, Wyo., to be agent for the Indians of the Union Agency in the Indian Territory.

POSTMASTERS.

Everett William Greene, to be postmaster at Patton, in the county of Cambria and State of Pennsylvania.

Samuel G. Wilson, to be postmaster at Bridgeport, in the county of Montgomery and State of Pennsylvania.

George D. Leonard, to be postmaster at Newberry, in the county of Lycoming and State of Pennsylvania.

George C. Bell, to be postmaster at Portland, in the county of Middlesex and State of Connecticut.

Thomas H. Williams, to be postmaster at Mount Carmel, in the county of Northumberland and State of Pennsylvania.

Michael Weyand, to be postmaster at Beaver, in the county of Beaver and State of Pennsylvania.

Charles Harris, to be postmaster at Westport, in the county of Fairfield and State of Connecticut.

George H. Ford, to be postmaster at Waterville, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut.

Sanford E. Chaffee, to be postmaster at Derby, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut.

Rufus C. Reed, to be postmaster at Damariscotta, in the county of Lincoln and State of Maine.

George R. Foster, to be postmaster at Lisbon Falls, in the county of Androscoggin and State of Maine.

Arthur A. Dinsmore, to be postmaster at Dover, in the county of Piscataquis and State of Maine.

Henry E. Merrick, to be postmaster at Henniker, in the county of Merrimack and State of New Hampshire.

Abbie H. Souther, to be postmaster at Cohasset, in the county of Norfolk and State of Massachusetts.

Charles Newhall, to be postmaster at Danvers, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts.

Charles H. Griffin, to be postmaster at Oakfield, in the county of Genesee and State of New York.

Thomas Moritz, to be postmaster at Glenridge, in the county of Essex and State of New Jersey.

Evan F. Benners, to be postmaster at Moorestown, in the county of Burlington and State of New Jersey.

Wesley Mulford, to be postmaster at Unadilla, in the county of Otsego and State of New York.

Dudley S. Mercereau, to be postmaster at Union, in the county of Broome and State of New York.

William J. Guthrie, to be postmaster at Philadelphia, in the county of Jefferson and State of New York.

John C. White, to be postmaster at Knoxville, in the county of Tioga and State of Pennsylvania.

Lewis W. Snyder, to be postmaster at Bethlehem, in the county of Northampton and State of Pennsylvania.

J. M. Brothers, to be postmaster at Knox, in the county of Clarion and State of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1900.

The House met at 1 o'clock p. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INSTRUCTION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut and Mr. LANHAM of Texas as directors of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LANE for one week, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following change of reference:

That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the consideration of so much of House Document No. 291 as relates to estimates for the Rock Island, Ill., Armory, and the Springfield, Mass., Armory, and that said estimates be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that was taken out?

THE LATE HON. DANIEL ERMENROUT.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Saturday, February 3, after the hour of 1 o'clock, be set apart for the purpose of paying fitting tributes of respect to my late predecessor, the Hon. DANIEL ERMENROUT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that February 3, after 1 o'clock, be set apart for memorial exercises on the death of the late Mr. ERMENTROUT, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMS. What day of the week is it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made. There was no objection.

REFERENCE BOOKS FOR HOUSE LIBRARY.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution I send to the Speaker's desk, and I ask for order, because it concerns every member of the House. I desire to say to gentlemen—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will suspend until his request for order is complied with. Gentlemen will resume their seats and cease conversation on the floor.

Mr. RAY of New York. In asking this unanimous consent—I desire to say that I will ask in connection with that resolution unanimous consent that all the amendments except the first be disagreed to and the resolution as originally introduced be adopted, for we find that the amendments are unnecessary, and the Committee on Accounts can take care of that matter; but they have no jurisdiction of the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the superintendent of documents be requested to furnish the House of Representatives, for the use of the House library, 50 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States (second edition, 1878), and also 50 copies of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States (volume 1, second edition, 1874 to 1891).

The amendments recommended by the committee were as follows:

Line 5, after "fifty," insert "two."

At the end of line 8 add the following: "two of which Supplements shall be for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary."

Also resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish, for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary, the indexed Digest of United States Reports, in three volumes, published by the Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Company; volumes 57 to 97, inclusive, of the Federal Reporter; one copy of Standard Unabridged Dictionary; Bouvier's Law Dictionary, last edition, and American and English Encyclopedia of Law, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in connection with that that these volumes of the Revised Statutes and Supplement are printed by the Government, so that this involves no expense whatever. It simply means a transfer of those volumes from the Superintendent of Documents, who has them, to the House library; and the librarian tells me, and it comes from all parts of the House, we have had no additional copies since 1886, and those we have have become scattered or lost, and these are absolutely necessary for the use of the House, the members of the House, and the committees of the House. The other amendments which were added by the Committee on the Judiciary we find are unnecessary, because the Committee on Accounts can take care of them. They may supply the books if they deem them necessary. I repeat my assertion, that if unanimous consent is given for immediate consideration, I will ask that all the amendments be disagreed to except the one providing for 53 copies of the Supplement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York said there were certain amendments.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent that all of the amendments be considered as disagreed to except the one providing for 53 copies of the Supplement, 2 of which are for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You mean it to be stricken out of the resolution?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is what I mean.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I would like to hear the resolution read as it will be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the motion of the gentleman from New York to be to strike out all the amendments except so much as gives the House library copies of the Revised Statutes and Supplements.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to strike out all the amendments except that which gives—what to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. RAY of New York. Two extra copies of the Supplement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the other amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 734. An act relating to Cuban vessels.

Senate concurrent resolution 4:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to have a survey made and to submit a report of the survey and an estimate for the improvement of navigation of the Livingston Creek, in Columbus County, N. C., and Lockwood Folly River, in Brunswick County, N. C.

Senate concurrent resolution 17:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 164, third session Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the Daughters of the American Revolution, 1890-1897, of which 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 4:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 164, third session Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the Daughters of the American Revolution, 1890-1897, of which 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 17:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to have a survey made and to submit a report of the survey and an estimate for the improvement of navigation of the Livingston Creek, in Columbus County, N. C., and Lockwood Folly River, in Brunswick County, N. C.—

to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

S. 734. An act relating to Cuban vessels—to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that in the change of reference made a few moments ago the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] states that he addressed the Chair for the purpose of making some observation in regard to the change of reference. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I enter the motion now because I did address the Chair, but the Chair apparently did not hear me. I do not want to lose any right of objecting to that reference, and I enter the motion now to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That will be considered as pending.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR TWELFTH CENSUS, ETC.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the House bill 2179, the census bill, and pending that, I desire to have some agreement made with reference to the length of general debate on the bill.

Mr. COX rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COX. I want to call attention to a resolution that has been sent in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is a motion already pending. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. COX. Well, he generally has the floor. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee suspend until this matter is disposed of?

Mr. COX. Certainly; anything to be agreeable. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. How much time, I will ask my colleague from Connecticut, will be satisfactory for general debate?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, as far as I understand the opposition to this bill, it is confined to section 4.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that members speak loud enough for the House to hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, as far as I understand the objection to this bill, it is confined to an amendment which is entitled section 4, authorizing the Director of the Census to contract outside of the Government Printing Office, or any Government establishment, for the publication of the reports. I will suggest to my colleague that general debate might run not later than 4 o'clock. That would give an hour, perhaps, for consideration under the five-minute rule, and give the House an opportunity for a vote on section 4 as to striking out the section, or any amendment that may be proposed to that section.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I ask that general debate on the bill be closed at 4 o'clock, or not later than 4 o'clock, as it may be that we shall not want to occupy that time, and then that the bill be taken up under the five-minute rule and reported back to the House not later than half past 4.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not later than 5, it being understood that we shall have a vote on the amendment to strike out section 4.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, that general debate on this bill shall extend to not later than 4 o'clock to-day, after which five-minute debate shall be had on the bill, with the right to vote on the last amendment to the bill, and that the vote be taken not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the right to vote on the amendment to strike out section 4?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is not wise to limit the five-minute debate to an hour. The whole controversy is to be on this fourth section, and I have no doubt there are many members of this House who desire to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. DALZELL. To the latter part of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to let the five-minute debate run until 2 or 3 o'clock to-morrow. I shall object to staying here until 5 o'clock and then have to remain to vote on one or two roll calls until 6 or 7 o'clock.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose we limit the general debate to 3 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How long will you allow the five-minute debate to run?

Mr. HOPKINS. Until 4 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose you have not read the bill through by that time?

Mr. HOPKINS. There is only one proposition in it that there is any controversy about.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the general debate be limited, and then let the Committee of the Whole control the five-minute debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to running the debate till 5 o'clock, and then to have possibly two roll calls and keep us here until 6 or 7 o'clock, when we have nothing to do to-morrow.

Now, let us go on with it until 5 o'clock—I do not care under what rule, whether it be general debate or five-minute debate—and then to-morrow debate it for an hour or so, and vote at 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock. Let us vote in the middle of the day. Let us not stay here until 6 o'clock this evening, when there is no necessity for it.

The SPEAKER. The motion before the House is that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which has been reported.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before that motion is put, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be closed at 4 o'clock to-day.

The SPEAKER. Pending that the gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be closed at 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOPKINS, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, with Mr. CANNON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, it is understood between the gentleman from Illinois and myself that he is to control half the time of general debate and that the other half be controlled by myself. That is the understanding, is it not?

Mr. HOPKINS. If that is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut suggests that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] control one half of the time for general debate and that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL] control the other half. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the members of this committee on both sides of the Chamber during the brief period that I shall occupy your time for the purpose of attempting to make some explanation of a portion of this bill, upon which there seems to be a sharp controversy among the members. The bill, excepting the fourth section, meets with the unanimous approval of the Census Committee of the House, and I take it that there will be no division of sentiment in this Chamber as to the propriety of enacting that speedily into law. There is a division of sentiment as to whether section 4 shall be ingrafted onto this bill and made a part of the law covering the taking of the Twelfth Census. That section reads as follows:

That the Director of the Census, whenever he shall find that there is a probability of delay in the printing or publishing of the census reports beyond the period required by the said act of March 3, 1890, he, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to contract with any individual, copartnership, or corporation for the printing and binding, or either, of any of said reports, in the manner prescribed by law for the letting of public contracts.

Mr. RAY of New York. That, I understand, is a proposed House amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a House committee amendment. When the law creating the present Census Bureau was passed it seemed to be the universal sentiment, not only among the Republicans of the House and Senate, but amongst Democrats as well, that some provision should be made that the volumes relating to population, mortality, vital statistics, the products of agriculture, and manufacturing and mechanical establishments should be prepared, tabulated, printed, and published by the 1st day of July, 1902, and so strong was that sentiment in the last Congress that that provision was ingrafted into law, and the Director of the Census was authorized and directed to bend all of the energies of his Bureau to that end. Any work authorized by law, outside and independent of those volumes, was subordinated to that for the purpose of getting these statistics out in time to make them useful to the general public.

In the publication of the volumes relating to the Tenth Census nine years expired from the time the census was taken before the last volumes were published and given to the general public. In the Eleventh Census the publication of these reports extended over a period of more than eight years, and people not only in this country, but statisticians and scientific men abroad found when these reports were published, at an expense of many millions of dollars to the Government, that they were absolutely useless, and the statisticians and scientific men in this country resorted to other methods and means to acquire the information contained in these delayed reports, in order to do the work that they were engaged in in their several callings.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow a question right there on that one point, so that he can carry it along?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, was not the delay largely the result of the compilations of the Census Office, and did they not keep men compiling the work for some four years after they should have closed up that work?

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, I can answer that. There is no question but what there was some delay in that, but I have a tabulated statement showing the time when many of these reports were sent to the Public Printer. For example, I find that after the proof plates were ready and returned to the Public Printer the fourth volume of Vital Statistics was retained by the Public Printer one year four months and sixteen days before it was published at all. I find that the Report on Agriculture, after the proof plates were ready, was retained by the Public Printer for nine months and one day; that volume 2 of Manufactures was retained one year one month and twenty-six days, and there were many other of these reports that were detained by the Public Printer in the same manner.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Do you mean it required that time to print them?

Mr. HOPKINS. In making this statement I am making no assault upon the Public Printer. The present occupant of that office is a gentleman whom I have known for more than a quarter of a century. He is a personal friend of mine, who is thoroughly competent to discharge the duties of that position, and I am not saying that if the work could be done there, Mr. Palmer could not do it as well as anybody else. I am simply calling the attention of members of this committee to the fact that in the Tenth Census the reports were delayed nine years and over, in the Eleventh Census the reports were delayed for some cause or another eight years and over, and that the Fifty-fifth Congress, when it made preparation for taking the Twelfth Census, provided that these five great divisions, which are of paramount importance to the general public, should be published, printed, and delivered to the general public by the 1st day of July, 1902.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen of this committee that if it can be shown that the present Public Printer, with the force that he has or the force that he can acquire, can meet the demands of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and can take the many tons of tabulated statistics that will be presented to him and publish them within the time prescribed by this law, there is no member of this House who will be more anxious than I to have this work done at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to bring to your notice section 28 of the Statutes at Large, 601, which reads as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any defect or any delay.

Again, here is another section which I want to bring to your attention:

All printing offices in the departments, now in operation or hereafter put in operation by law, shall be considered a part of the Government Printing Office and shall be under the control of the Public Printer.

Now, there are two statutes which seem to cover that point.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me answer the gentleman from Georgia first. I can say that the law to which I have just called attention, limiting the publication of these five great divisions of the Twelfth Census to the 1st day of July, 1902, is a provision that was never incorporated in any previous census law since the foundation of the Government.

The Director of the Census is not desirous of taking this printing away from the Public Printer; but if the Congress and the country demand that he shall have these reports printed and ready to distribute to the general public by the 1st day of July, 1902, then this Congress must take some action in order to facilitate the publication of these reports. Or if Congress shall do away with this limitation and say that they care not whether these reports are published at that time or at a later date, then that emergency is met and the Director of the Census will go on with his work as prescribed by law. Under existing law, as I will demonstrate, if gentlemen will permit me to proceed for a few minutes—

Mr. DALZELL. Will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DALZELL. You said a few moments ago that you were perfectly willing that the Public Printer should conduct this work if it could be done within a proper time. Now, I want to know whether or not the Public Printer was called before your committee and consulted with reference to this matter?

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, Mr. Chairman, the Public Printer was not called before the committee, but I have a letter here from the Public Printer, in answer to a letter of the Director of the Census, in regard to these publications, and during my time I will send both letters to the Clerk and have them read from the desk. The letter from the Director of the Census estimates the amount of work that will be sent to the Public Printer, the number of volumes within the limitations of the publications of the Tenth and Eleventh censuses, and then asks him, as you will see from the letter, how long it will take him to do the work that will be thus sent him by the Director of the Census.

Mr. DALZELL. Was that letter written before or after this bill was agreed upon?

Mr. HOPKINS. It makes no difference.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand my friend to say it makes no difference. I suppose that means it was written after.

Mr. HOPKINS. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania will not go into factions opposition.

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. But I am seeking information.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman does not show the spirit I would like to see prevail in this debate.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1902.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation of the 12th instant, relative to the time required by you to print and bind the several census reports, I herewith submit an estimate of the number of volumes, number of pages, and size of the edition which will probably be issued.

	Number of volumes.	Pages.	Edition.
Population.....	2	2,108	60,000
Agriculture.....	2	1,848	20,000
Manufacture.....	4	3,378	30,000
Vital Statistics.....	2	2,500	40,000
Compendium.....	3	3,210	150,000

On this basis, will you please inform me as to the length of time necessary to do the work, manner in which copy must be supplied, how many pages of copy will be required per day, and all other information which may be necessary?

Can you work on the several reports at one time if part of the copy for each is furnished?

Kindly advise me at an early date on the above points.

Respectfully,

W. R. MERRIAM,
Director of the Census.

Hon. F. W. PALMER,
Public Printer, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, I should like to have the members of the House listen to the letter written by the Public Printer as to the time it will take him to do the work.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I prefer not at the present time.

Mr. SHATTUC. Just a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will you agree to an amendment in the fifteenth line, after the words "any individual, copartnership, or corporation," to insert "employing exclusively union labor," so that it will read:

Sec. 4. That the Director of the Census * * * be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to contract with any individual, copartnership, or corporation employing exclusively union labor for the printing and binding, or either, of any of said reports, etc.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; I have no objection whatever to that. The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1902.

SIR: Your letter of January 13, relative to the time required by this office to print and bind the reports of the Twelfth Census mentioned by you (Population, Agriculture, Manufactures, Vital Statistics, and Compendium), did not reach this office until yesterday morning.

In reply, I have to say that, on the basis of your estimate of the number of volumes, pages, and number of copies of each report to be issued, it is believed that the work can be done by this office in three hundred working days. In order to accomplish this, however, it will be necessary for the Census Office to begin to furnish copy in large quantities at the commencement of the period of three hundred working days; to furnish it from day to day during a period of one hundred and fifty days in an amount sufficient to keep a large force of compositors employed without interruption on account of lack of copy, and to furnish all the copy for the reports within one hundred and fifty days from the time the work is commenced.

It will also be necessary for your office to promptly return, and from day to day, the proofs for plating and printing, that the bindery may have a sufficient length of time within which to do the binding. The copy should be prepared and supplied in such a manner that no radical changes therefrom will be required in the proofs.

Work could, of course, proceed on several reports at one time, but, in order that presswork and binding may be commenced before all of the reports are in type, it would be much better to place this office in possession of the copy of complete reports at a time.

If it is proposed to insert illustrations in any of these reports, the material for them should be supplied, if possible, in advance of all the copy for the publication in which they are to appear.

Respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. W. R. MERRIAM,

Director of the Census, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOPKINS. The members of the committee will notice that Mr. Palmer says that it will take about three hundred working days, which covers a period of one year, and we know that under the most favorable conditions set out in that law it will be absolutely impossible for the Director of the Census to comply with all of the requirements set forth in Mr. Palmer's letter, or for the Public Printer himself to meet all the requirements set forth in his letter and that of the Director of the Census, because it is perfectly plain that after they have finished their final revision it may be necessary for them to make repeated corrections and changes even. So that anybody who is familiar with the subject knows that instead of being one year, as the Public Printer says, it will take him one and a half years from the time that this material is given to him by the Director of the Census before the public will receive the reports.

Now, the Director of the Census tells me that it would be impossible, if this bill is incorporated into law, giving him the extra force that he here asks and giving him all the facilities that he has now under the present law, to send this material to the Public Printer or to any printer before the 1st day of January, 1902. Now, mark that, gentlemen—that it is utterly impossible, with the facilities that he has or with any that can be given him, to get this material to the Public Printer or to any printer at all before the 1st day of January, 1902. That leaves only one hundred and fifty working days to get out these volumes relating to these five great subdivisions and meet the requirements of the law. So that, on the showing of the Public Printer, there must be an extension in the time limit in the present law or else this amendment that I propose must be adopted.

Now, gentlemen, that brings me to the question of whether we should have this all done by the Public Printer or delay the issue to the public of statistics that are so important to the people of this country, so important to scientists, so important to all statisticians, just for the sake of benefiting a few trades-union people that work in the Government Printing Office. It is admitted that we can get as good work done, and it can be done as cheaply in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or in any of our large cities, as it can be done by the Public Printer. The only question that is presented here, and the one that has created the opposition to the committee amendment, is the fact that the work done by the Public Printer is union work. The union men in the Government Printing Office claim that if this amendment is adopted the work will be done by nonunion men.

I wish to say to the members of this committee that there is no intention upon the part of the Director of the Census to have any part of this work done in other than a union office. It is his purpose to take these five great divisions and give as much of the work to the Public Printer as it is possible for him to do. If he can do two divisions, he will have two of them; if he can do three divisions within the six months, he shall have the three divisions. It is impossible, on his own statement, to do all five of them; so that the Director of the Census must of necessity go outside for some of this work.

I can see no reason, gentlemen, why that should not be done, because the wording of the amendment prepared by the Director of the Census fixes it so that he is compelled to go to the Public Printer. When he finds he is compelled to go outside, he only goes outside to the extent that is necessary for him to go in order to comply with the law. I want to say here and now, speaking for the Census Committee, and speaking for the Director of the Census, that the work done outside will be done by union labor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] evidently has an amendment of that kind, but whether an amendment of that kind is adopted or not, if this recommendation of the Census Committee is adopted, the work that goes outside will be done by union labor.

I have received, as many of you have, a number of telegrams from labor unions in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. They have been stirred up by the union in the city of Washington to the belief that this is taking away the labor from the union. I want to dispel that illusion and do away with that impression. I want to say, as I have said, if this amendment is adopted, whatever work may necessarily go outside will be done by the same class of labor that it is being done by in the Printing Office in the city of Washington, and that, it seems to me, takes away all the argument that has been urged by the committee of labor who waited on me in Washington and all the arguments that can be inferred from the telegrams that have been showered on the members on both sides of the House.

Mr. FARIS. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. FARIS. In order to dispel the illusion and get rid of the impression, why not, as chairman of the committee, inform the House that you will offer the amendment which will dispel and destroy it?

Mr. HOPKINS. If that is the will of the House, I will do so when we reach it, or I will allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC], who first called my attention to it and who has evidently prepared an amendment of that kind, to offer it, and if it is offered by him I will accept it.

Mr. FARIS. I make the suggestion at this time in order that we may all understand that it will be offered and accepted.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say that if the member from Ohio who interrupted me [Mr. SHATTUC] and indicated that he had an amendment of that kind will offer it I will accept it. The only observation I make is that inasmuch as we have put the obligation upon the Director of the Census to have these publications at a certain time, we should clothe him with full authority to do the work. The adoption of the committee amendment is no assault on the Public Printer. We all know the amount of work he has to do, and we all know that he is compelled at times to lay aside some of the work which is sent there to be done in order to meet the demands of Congress on emergency printing.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit me to preface my question, I will say that I am in favor of the bill, and I have no hostility to labor organizations. I have heard him intimate that he would accept an amendment providing that the work done under the bill should be done by union labor. I desire to ask the gentleman what right has Congress, if it intends to let this work outside to the lowest bidder by competition, to limit it to a certain price? Have we the legal right to do it?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say this, that the argument is made that all public printing should be done by the Public Printer. I have a letter from the Postmaster-General in which it is shown that the Postal Guide and a large amount of work in that Department is done outside, and done as efficiently and as well done as at the Public Printing Office. And the Appropriations Committee, so ably presided over by my colleague who is now in the chair, has appropriated as much as $125,000 at one time for work of that kind to be done outside the Government Printing Office; and it is only done because the Public Printing Office is limited in its capacity and can not do the work.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. How about the legal question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think they have that right. We may differ about that.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me just one question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman says he will accept an amendment providing by law that the public printing done outside shall be done by union men. I want to know if that is not rank class legislation?

Mr. HOPKINS. Each member must settle that for himself. I make this statement only to show that there is no hostility to the ranks of labor, as is contended by those opposed to this amendment. There would be no opposition, or at least but little strength to it, were it not for this issue that is made; and knowing as I do that the labor at the Government Printing Office is union labor, I deem it but fair to those who favor the amendment, as I do, and fair to the Director of the Census, to say that this amendment is not hostile to that labor, and the work that is to be done outside, if this amendment is adopted, will be done by the same kind of labor found in the Government Printing Office. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BABCOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. If the amendment which the gentleman has proposed is adopted, and all this work shall be done by union labor, does not that antagonize the present law and practice, to wit, that the work shall be let to the lowest bidder? When these bids are advertised and a "rat" office comes in and offers to do the work for 75 per cent of the price of a union office, what is the Director going to do in that case?

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a "rat" office in America that can do this work. There is not a "rat" office in this country that can do any part of it. And putting the amendment in as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio is, in my judgment, a limitation that is not in conflict with existing law. It is simply a limitation without affecting the law that is already upon the statute books.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. I notice you have a letter from the Public Printer.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. LANDIS. Was the Public Printer summoned before your committee?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have answered that question two or three times.

Mr. LANDIS. I did not hear the gentleman's answer. I was not present at the time.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Public Printer was not before the committee, but the Public Printer has the estimates of the Director of the Census, as shown in the letter read at the Clerk's desk, and has taken a day or two to figure out the matter, and has shown that it will take him three hundred working days to do the work.

Mr. LANDIS. What do you mean by a working day—eight hours?

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, I mean just what the Public Printer means by that.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, he means by that a day of eight hours.

Mr. HOPKINS. I don't know whether he means that or whether he does not.

Mr. LANDIS. The Public Printer tells me that he can easily put on three shifts of workmen.

Mr. DALZELL. And do the work in one hundred days.

Mr. HULL. That will take him only one hundred days.

Mr. LANDIS. Yes. In other words, the Public Printer tells me and other members of Congress that if he is given an opportunity to explain to the committee he can demonstrate conclusively that he can do this work.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Public Printer does not have to demonstrate to anybody but the Director of the Census. If this amendment is adopted, and the Public Printer can show to the Director of the Census that he can do this work in one hundred days or within the time limited by law, then he gets the contract under this proposed amendment.

Now, there is no hostility on the part of the Director of the Census to the Public Printer; none at all; but the gentleman can appreciate his desire, when he is required to get out the work, that he shall be put in a position where he can demand that the work shall be done. If the Public Printer can do this work, as indicated by my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], then I can assure my friend that the work will be done at the Government Printing Office, because there is no more faithful friend of the Public Printer than the Director of the Census himself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman if he will not accept a substitute for section 4 which will bridge over this controversy and answer the purpose that he is seeking to establish?

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, I will look at the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me read it.

Mr. HOPKINS. How much time have I occupied, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me read the proposed substitute:

The Public Printer, on the request of the Director of the Census, shall establish in the office of the Twelfth Census a branch printing office, which shall be under the direction and control of the Public Printer.

Mr. HOPKINS. If you will make it "sufficiently large to meet the demands of the Census Office"—

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You will accept it?

Mr. HOPKINS. I personally will favor it. I will consult with the balance of the committee; and if they are satisfied, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Is there any provision for the taking of the census of deaf-mutes outside of asylums?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; we have covered that.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, there will be no controversy between my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] and myself, and no difference of opinion, I take it, in this House as to the desirability of the prompt issuing of the census reports. The Committee on the Census in the last Congress recognized the fact that it was desirable to have the results of the census in the hands of the public as early as possible, and much sooner than the results were given to the public in the last census and the census preceding.

So, then, the Committee on the Census in the last Congress, recognizing this desirability of prompt issuing of census reports, put in the census bill this provision:

The only volumes that shall be prepared or published in connection with the Twelfth Census, except the special reports herein provided for, shall relate to population, mortality, and vital statistics, the products of agriculture and of manufacturing and mechanical establishments as above mentioned, and shall be designated as and constitute the census reports, which said reports shall be published not later than the 1st day of July, 1902.

That is a provision of law which is mandatory upon the Director of the Census, and, as I construe it, mandatory upon the Public Printer, and, as I construe it, mandatory upon the Congress of the United States, in furnishing to the Census Director and to the Public Printer a proper and sufficient appropriation to carry out that mandate. I think it is a provision which is mandatory upon everybody who has direct or indirect connection with the enumeration and the publication of the census reports.

Further than that, Mr. Chairman, the committee in the last Congress put this provision in the bill, and to that I call the special attention of the members of this committee. It is section 25:

That the Director of the Census is hereby authorized to print and bind in the Census Office such blanks, circulars, envelopes, and other items as may be necessary, and to print, publish, and distribute from time to time bulletins and reports of the preliminary and other results of the various investigations required by this act.

Under the provisions of that section the Director of the Census is authorized to establish in the Census Office a printing office, the limitations of which are only described by the limitations of the appropriation which the Congress of the United States makes for that purpose. The design of that section was intended to facilitate the early publication of all the results of the census taken this year. Now, you will bear in mind that the reports of the census, which are mandatory in their publication by July 1, 1902, cover four topics, the topics of population, of vital statistics, of manufactures, and of agriculture. Those are to be the principal reports of the census this year, as they were in the Tenth and Eleventh censuses.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has read from a statistical table showing the time taken in the publication of those reports in the Eleventh Census. This table was furnished by the Director of the Census and given to the committee. It comprises a report of the time when the final proof was received at the Printing Office and of the time when the whole edition of the work was ready for distribution, as to each one of the volumes relating to agriculture, population, manufactures, and vital statistics.

The gentleman gave you the time which elapsed between the receipt at the Public Printing Office of the final proof and the distribution of the edition in three cases. All together there were ten volumes, and the average time which elapsed between the receipt at the Government Printing Office from the Census Office of the final proof for those volumes and the handing over by the Public Printer to the Secretary of the Interior of the completed edition for distribution to the public was less than six months. The edition of one volume was ready for distribution in two months and six days, one in two months and eighteen days, one in one month and three days, one in three months and twenty-nine days, and the third volume of the Report on Vital Statistics in one month and fifteen days. I have the statement, as follows:

The following statement shows the time required by the Government Printing Office to print certain of the Eleventh Census reports after the finally revised plate proof was returned "ready for the press":

	Final proof returned.	Edition delivered.	Time taken to print.
Agriculture	May 23, 1895	Feb. 24, 1896	9 months 1 day.
Manufactures 1	Oct. 29, 1895	May 5, 1896	6 months 7 days.
Manufactures 2	Mar. 28, 1895	May 23, 1896	13 months 26 days.
Manufactures 3	Apr. 3, 1895	June 9, 1895	2 months 6 days.
Population 1	Apr. 13, 1895	July 1, 1895	2 months 18 days.
Population 2	July 31, 1897	Sept. 2, 1897	1 month 2 days.
Vital Statistics 1	Sept. 29, 1897	Jan. 27, 1898	3 months 29 days.
Vital Statistics 2	Jan. 8, 1897	Jan. 8, 1897
Vital Statistics 3	Dec. 7, 1894	Jan. 22, 1895	1 month 15 days.
Vital Statistics 4	July 26, 1895	Dec. 12, 1895	16 months 16 days.

The statement of the date upon which the last proof was returned "O. K. and ready for press" is from the records of the Government Printing Office, and that showing date of delivery of the printed edition was furnished by the document clerk of the Interior Department, to whom all reports were delivered for distribution.

Now, there is a reason why in the three cases there was so long a time elapsing between the receipt of the final proof from the Census Office and the delivery by the Government Printing Office of the full edition. It was hoped, it was suggested, that the Government Printer might come before the Committee on Census and give officially the reason why this long time elapsed in the delivery of the edition of three volumes; but, unfortunately, it was not the sense of the committee that the Government Printer should appear before us. So we have only to take the statement as we get it, unofficially from the Printing Office, in reference to the time that ensued between the receipt of the final proof in the Government Printing Office and the delivery of the edition.

I think I ought in justice to this committee to state that there were peculiar reasons why some of the reports of the last census were delayed so long after the type was set up and after the final proof had gone to the Printing Office from the Census Office. It is at least a fact that one volume was held up by an officer of the Government, superior even to the Public Printer or the Director of the Census, for further examination and further correction. It is a fact, also, that there was in the case of one or two of these volumes a large volume of type which was held up from distribution awaiting final proofs, so that it could not be used for other purposes. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE], will touch further on this matter. Mind you, then, as now, the Government Printer was restricted in the facilities of his office in doing the public work by the appropriations the Congress of the United States gives him for that work.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. What are the comparative facilities of the Public Printing Office as to equipment and number of employees and their power to do this work as compared with the power to do this work in 1890?

Mr. RUSSELL. The facilities of the Government Printing Office are increasing very rapidly from year to year. I can not answer that question in detail, but I should say the present facilities of the Government Printing Office over ten years ago were much greater—nearly one-third greater.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman, Did the committee make an effort to ascertain the comparative ability of the office at this time and the last time to do this work?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, it was suggested to the Census Committee and it was requested of the Census Committee that the Public Printer be called before that committee to make a statement of his facilities for doing the work and his equipment, and also as to the time in which he would be occupied in doing the work; but that suggestion, unfortunately, did not meet with the favor of the majority of the committee, and so—

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Is it not a fact that the committee claimed that if the Public Printer was brought before them he would demonstrate conclusively that he could do the work?

Mr. HOPKINS. That statement is not correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. The members of the committee opposed to this amendment did not fail to try to have the Public Printer appear before the Census Committee.

Mr. GAINES. Did you go down to the bottom of that inquiry—did the Public Printer refuse to testify or afford you the information, or was he asked?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Public Printer did not refuse; he was not invited to come before the committee. We suggested in committee—

Mr. GAINES. Was that question asked the Public Printer?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, to questions by individual members of the committee and by members of this House interested in this subject, asking the Public Printer whether he could do this work, he replied that he could do the work in any time that the law designates or mandates him to do it in, provided the Congress of the United States gives him an appropriation with which to do the work.

Mr. GAINES. Why is it that other parts of the census prepared under the present law are so far behind, if they are behind? If for the lack of means, they should be furnished.

Mr. RUSSELL. In a moment I will answer that question. The records of the last census show that the Government Printer, under a mandate of law, would have been prepared to issue any edition then, and the record of that office is a very creditable one. Further, the chairman of the committee has had read at the desk a letter addressed by the Director of the Census to the Public Printer, with the reply of the Public Printer to it, relating to the facilities for doing that work within a specified time.

That letter did not appear before the Committee on the Census, and the only answer we can make to it is by the inquiries made by individual members of the House of the Public Printer. From letters of the Public Printer, which will be read later, he states, as I have said before, that he stands ready, with the facilities of the greatest printing establishment in the world, to do any kind of work in any specified time, provided only the Congress of the United States gives him the money to do that work with.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman has not answered my question. I asked it very seriously and for my own enlightenment and that of others around me.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will answer that later.

Mr. GAINES. My question is why that work under the former law has not been completed.

Mr. RUSSELL. I can not yield now.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman said he would answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, the Public Printer is entirely dependent upon the appropriation you make here for him to do the work. The letter which he gave in answer to the inquiry of the Director of the Census was based in his estimate upon the force actually employed to-day in the Printing Office, working eight hours a day, and without any calculation or estimate whatever as to the increase of that force or as to the working of two or three shifts for a force.

So I stand here, not representing the Government Printer any more than I am the Director of the Census, to declare to this House that if the House does its duty in making an appropriation the Government Printer will execute the work which the Director of the Census gives him to execute within any specified time which the law requires him to do it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit me a statement right there?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was in the office of the Public Printer two days ago and was told that they had expensive plates and machinery bought for the other census, which are not by any means obsolete, and with which the work could be done with great economy, and I do not believe the House, under the circumstances, will hesitate to give this work to him.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will my colleague allow me? In response to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia, an amendment has been prepared by my colleague from South Carolina which I desire to read—

Mr. RUSSELL. I submit that my colleague ought not to interrupt me. There will be time enough to consider that later. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, in the first place, as I said at the beginning, the general census law which we passed in the last Congress contemplated a public printing office to be established in the Census Office for the purpose of printing the schedules and preliminary work of the census. That printing office has not been fully established, but a printer has been appointed and some of the machinery has been purchased, and the office is getting under way, and it is calculated to enlarge it as the Director of the Census may recommend, under the appropriations of Congress later.

But the schedules which have been prepared and sent out to the supervisors of the census for preliminary work have been turned into the Government Printing Office. I have here the records, showing not only the capacity of the Government Printing Office to execute these orders, but the facility and promptness in executing the orders in a short space of time.

The copy for the general agricultural schedules, which is to be used all over the country in the collection of statistics, was received at the Government Printing Office November 2, 1899. Seven million five hundred thousand copies of that schedule were required to be printed. The proof was sent to the Census Office November 7, five days after it was received at the office. The proof was returned to the Printing Office December 8, one month and one day having elapsed while the proof was kept at the Census Office.

The matter was put on the press December 12 at the Printing Office, four days after the final proof was received, and nearly the whole number of copies, 7,500,000, of the schedules were delivered January 15, 1900. The copy for the population schedule, the schedule which is to be used all over this country in the enumeration of the people, was received at the Government Printing Office October 9, 1899. This first order required the printing of 1,500,000 copies.

Mr. BROMWELL. How many pages in that schedule?

Mr. RUSSELL. A number of pages; that is my memory. The proof was sent to the Census Office October 11, three days after being received. The final proof was returned to the Printing Office November 24, one month and thirteen days having elapsed while the proof was held in the Census Office for correction. The proof was put on the press November 29, five days after the final proof was received at the Printing Office, and the whole edition was completed December 29, the very day it was received.

Mr. RAY of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if there is any explanation that he knows of for that delay at the Census Bureau in reading these proofs?

Mr. RUSSELL. I must say to the gentleman from New York that I do not consider that an extraordinary delay. I think the members of this committee should bear in mind that the time necessarily consumed in the revision of proof between the original proof and the sending back of the final proof must be considerable. It has to be very carefully gone over, additions have to be made, and that is one reason why I am utterly opposed to doing the work outside the Government Printing Office, so admirably equipped for that work. [Applause.] I think that the gentleman from New York and others will understand that I am not reading these in any way as a criticism on the Census Office. I think they were expeditious in the time they consumed.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. If it should be developed that additional facilities should be provided for printing the reports, does the gentleman think this Congress should provide those facilities?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman the chairman of the committee is prepared to offer an amendment to accomplish that purpose as a substitute for this section, will the gentleman accept it?

Mr. RUSSELL. Let me go on with my remarks and consider that later. The schedule on mortality statistics was presented to the Printing Office October 14, and the proof was sent back to the Census Office October 19, five days afterwards. The final proof was sent to the Printing Office November 24, in one month and five days. And the whole edition was printed December 15, sixteen days after it was put to press.

So I have statistics in reference to the printing of other circulars and schedules which have already gone to the Public Printer from the Director of the Census, all indicating a pleasant disposition on the part of the Public Printer to meet, just so far as we give him the means of meeting, all the requirements put upon him by the law and by the Director of the Census.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman indulge me just one more inquiry?

Mr. RUSSELL. Just a moment.

Mr. GAINES. Just a question. I asked you why it was the Eleventh Census had not been completed. You have directly, I infer, answered me by saying the reason was that the machinery and force of the Public Printer were used in printing for the Twelfth Census.

Mr. RUSSELL. Why, as far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the Eleventh Census has been completed.

Mr. GAINES. I do not so understand. I was informed to the contrary, and I want to know why.

Mr. RUSSELL. I referred to a statistical table which the Director of the Census presented to us, showing in the Eleventh Census what time had elapsed in the publication of the four subject volumes which are dealt with in this bill, the time between the receipt of the final proof and the delivery of the general edition. I do not care to go over that again, and I can not yield further now, Mr. Chairman.

Now, I am opposed to this amendment which is put upon the Senate bill for two principal reasons. First of all, it overthrows, or attempts to overthrow, an established policy of this Government in reference to public printing. For the first time we, by law, are asked to give to an officer of the Government authority to go outside of our Government Printing Office and contract, without any limitation whatever, except as the general law may put those limitations upon him, for work in any other office that he sees fit, anywhere.

Now, if this amendment carries, it may be made a precedent which may be called upon by any Department, by any bureau of any Department, by any officer of the Government, to take printing away from the Government Printing Office. Whatever may have been its intention, I consider it a very dangerous step to take. We have a Government Printing Office, admittedly the largest and best-equipped office in the world, an office purposely equipped to be ready at any time to fulfill any mandate which the law of Congress may put upon it. We have a Government Printing Office which necessarily must be more fully equipped than any single private office anywhere in this country.

So I am opposed on general principles to doing anything which shall say, either directly or by inference or by a precedent, that we are inclined to take away the Government printing from our own office. Further than that, Mr. Chairman, if, as I deny now, there be an emergency in the case of the printing of the census reports—and it can only come through the failure of Congress to make sufficient appropriation to do the work—if the emergency comes through that failure, now is not the time when we should enter upon any such legislation as this proposed amendment for contract work.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I interrupt the gentleman right there?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Would the gentleman from Connecticut have any objection to substituting an amendment here for section 4, which is an amendment, to provide that the Public Printer, at the request of the Director of the Census, should furnish additional facilities, so as to do this work within the time required by law?

Mr. RUSSELL. I see no objection to any such direction or mandate, if you please, as that; but I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. RAY] that Congress has got to give the Public Printer the means to do this work, and that comes right back to why I object to this amendment at this particular time. According to the statement of the chairman of the committee, which I think was the statement made by the Director of the Census before our committee, the Director of the Census will not have this work ready for any printer before January, 1902. We are to have another Congress before then. We are certain to have another Census Committee. Who will be the Public Printer we do not know. What the Director of the Census will have to furnish to the Public Printer we do not know.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose this section 4 were stricken out of the bill, would not the Public Printer, under the law, be compelled to do this printing?

Mr. RUSSELL. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will recall, I stated at the very beginning that I believed the provision in the census law which we passed in the last Congress was equally mandatory upon the Public Printer and upon the Director of the Census. And, further, I stated that I believed as long as that law stood upon the statute book it was mandatory upon the Congress of the United States to give to both officials the money necessary to carry out its provisions.

But to go on, the Director of the Census can not tell to-day the amount of printing, the amount of work, if you please, that he will call upon the Public Printer or any other printer to do in January, 1902. I take it that depends largely upon the extent to which he will tabulate the statistics gathered, and that it will depend upon the length of the reports, the deductions, so to speak, which he will make. Now, the time when we should make this amendment, if we make it at all, is some time in the next Congress.

And further, answering my friend from New York, I am inclined to think, with full deference to the Committee on the Census, with the chairman of which I am very sorry to disagree on this matter, and standing, as I ought to and as I do, for all its prerogatives, I think that such amendment should properly accompany appropriations which are subsequently to be made for the work in the Census Office and for the work in the Government Printing Office, and may come, perhaps, from another committee of this House than from the Census Committee.

In other words, to sum this point up, outside of my objection to the general taking away of public printing from the Government Printing Office, I can not see either the necessity or the reason or the good judgment of anybody in passing such an amendment as is proposed at this time. I am inclined to think that it is harmful. I am inclined to think that it is not good policy for the Director of the Census, so far as his personal convenience and his personal safety are concerned.

I am free to say to the members of this House that if I was a Government official in charge of a great Government establishment directed to do a certain work, and there were tools at my next door to finish that work, the law prescribing how it should be done, relying upon Congress for the appropriation necessary to have it done, I should very much prefer to have that work finished under Government control than to take the chances of the annoyances, and, as I believe, the expenses, of going outside and engaging in open competition in contract work.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I want to see if I understand the gentleman. Your contention is that in order to do the work, and to do it in time, all that is needed is a sufficient appropriation, and that it is premature now to consider that question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have the personal assurance of the Public Printer that if Congress gives him the money he will do any amount of work in any time which you require of him; that he has the facilities, so to speak, in the Government Printing Office. He has the general facilities and the machinery to do it, but he has to have the money to run that machinery and to pay his help. He can not do the work, perhaps, working the force now employed there only eight hours a day. He possibly could not do the given amount of work in the specified time with that force working that number of hours.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. I want to know if you do not think it would cost the Government less to have the Government Printer do this work than it will if we go outside?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is my opinion that it would cost the Government in the end very much less, because the statistics of the last census, the statistics of the census before, and the record of Government printing show that the great expense was in the correction of proof—the changes. Why, I will ask the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to the fact that in one of the volumes of the last census, I think it was, 700 pages set up and printed had to be entirely stricken out.

Mr. GAINES. That was under civil-service machinery, too, was it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Now, do not ask me to call attention to the date of the years when that was done.

Mr. GAINES. I do not care under whose administration it was done, if it was done under the civil service.

Mr. RAY of New York. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman when he is speaking, but I want to know if he can point out any objection to a provision in this bill which would enable the Director of the Census to call upon the Public Printer, if the Public Printer is to do the work, and insist upon his providing additional facilities for doing this work? Is there any objection to such a provision?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not if Congress gives him the means to do it. Mr. RAY of New York. Very well, we have nothing to do with that, and the Committee on the Census has nothing to do with that, and the whole of the work will go for naught unless the Committee on Appropriations gives the money. Now, if such a provision is to come here, and there is no objection to it, it seems to me it would do away with the whole difficulty, provided the Committee on Appropriations sees fit to appropriate the money.

Mr. RUSSELL. Very likely; but I believe that provision is in the original law we passed.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mine would not be substituted for it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think there is any need of an amendment or substitute at this time.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. I agree with the gentleman heartily. I do not think there is any need of an amendment nor any committee amendment or substitute; but here is something that has been suggested which is practically a direction to the Public Printer to prepare himself to do that work promptly, to comply with a mandatory law. I will read it to the gentleman, and ask him if he approves it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I presume, without your reading it, I would approve it; but will the gentleman consider that that properly and in its proper place goes with the means that Congress must give the Public Printer to increase his facilities. That is all. I do not want anything to go into this bill which will delay the preliminary work of the census, which shall in the slightest degree seem to arouse a feeling of lack of harmony between the Government Printer and the Director of the Census. I do not know that there is any to-day.

I am sure that this amendment was not suggested by the Government Printer, for the Government Printer has had no opportunity to pass officially upon it; and I assume that the Director of the Census proposed it and asked the committee of this House to adopt it because he thought it was necessary. But in that I think he was wrong for the two principal reasons which I have given; and, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to say anything which shall be construed as proposing or suggesting any impediment or any handicap upon the prompt issuing of the census reports.

If it be necessary, at the proper time, if it be the opinion of the committee that now is the proper time, to put such instructions as the gentleman from Wisconsin has in his hand in this bill, I am content. My principal contention is that I do not want here and now to take any action that will in any way destroy or tend to destroy the Government Printing Office or establish a precedent that the Government printing is going outside, up and down the country, offering itself to the lowest bidder. Sometimes contracts go to the highest bidder. I think we ought to prevent that, at least.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LACEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat, as I understand, one of the troubles is the liability of conflict between the Public Printer and the Director of the Census?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think there is any such liability.

Mr. LACEY. If section 4 were adopted, and we added this provision:

Provided, That before letting any such contract the Public Printer shall first find and certify in writing that such probability of delay exists.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not in favor of that, because that brings up the principal reason why I am opposed to taking away the printing from the Government Printing Office. If you are going to do that, abolish the Government Printing Office, for which we are appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars every year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Suppose the Public Printer's Office should be destroyed by conflagration. How would you have it printed then?

Mr. RUSSELL. Outside, I suppose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Suppose the work should be arrested by labor strikes, which is a supposable case. How would you have that work done then?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is not so supposable a case as the other. We would have to do the best we could. The very instant the destruction came to that Printing Office we would set about the institution of another Printing Office, or else go entirely out of the Government printing business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Suppose there was no appropriation available for that purpose?

Mr. RUSSELL. We would make it as soon as we convened.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. You would have to have an extra session of Congress, likely.

Mr. RUSSELL. Perhaps not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is not the only effect of this amendment to provide against a contingency of that character?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think not. Suppose we should all die; I suppose something would have to be done by which another Congress might come together.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But it could not be done before the 1st of July, 1902.

Mr. RUSSELL. Before I close I want to say I have here a number of letters. I think they come from heads of nearly every Department; but they are certainly from the Treasury Department, from the Agricultural Department, from the War Department, from the bureaus of the different Departments, all giving instances not only of the facility, but of the promptness of the Government Printing Office in executing work. I wish to call particular attention to the letters from the Treasury Department and the Agricultural Department, which I will submit:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 15, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Secretary Gage wishes me to express his high appreciation of the valuable service recently rendered to this Department by Capt. H. T. Brian, foreman of printing. The short time the Department has set for itself in which to float the new war loan made it necessary that the utmost expedition should be employed in every feature of the plan to successfully place the issue of bonds. It was, therefore, especially gratifying that the Government Printing Office was able to deliver almost 4,000,000 circulars, pamphlets, and blanks in the short period intervening between 5.30 p. m. Saturday and 9 a. m. Monday last.

Very truly, yours,

F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1899.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN BRIAN: I beg to express my appreciation of the promptness with which you have printed the Monthly Summary. The tables of imports for consumption were unusually difficult, and the total number of pages was larger than that of any preceding month except that of June, yet it reaches me on the 3d day of the month—just two weeks earlier than that of the June number, which corresponded in size with this. What more can I say in expression of my appreciation?

Very truly, yours,

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

Capt. H. T. BRIAN,
Foreman of Printing, Government Printing Office.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS,
Washington, D. C., November 29, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith press copy of the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1899, in which are indicated a very few slight corrections which were overlooked in the hurry of reading the proof, and I will be obliged to you if you will have the same corrected in the remainder of the edition.

I am directed by the Secretary of Agriculture to thank you for the very great promptness with which the report was handled and printed.

Very respectfully,

GEO. WM. HILL.

Capt. H. T. BRIAN,
Foreman of Printing, Government Printing Office.

Just one other point. I want to call the attention of the committee to this point, which is essential. You can not contract your Government printing into an outside establishment where you have a seal of secrecy over it or the absolute control over it that you have with the Government Printing Office; and that is an important consideration, not only for Congress, but every department of this Government. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE].

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, with the exception of the fourth section. The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Census, sent to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Public Printer, in which he stated that the work required by the Census Office could be done in three hundred working days, and I assume that to mean three hundred working days of eight hours each. There was nothing said in that letter about putting on two extra shifts, or being able to do the work in a third of the time, but in order to be sure as to the capacities and facilities in the Public Printing Office I telephoned the Public Printer and received the letter in reply which I would like to have read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1900.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request made to me this morning, I will state that the Government Printing Office is equipped with material and employees to execute promptly the reports of the Census Bureau for the Twelfth Census in the time required.

It seems to me that the allotment of contracts for this printing to private or corporate parties would leave the superior facilities already provided by the Government in this office to be unused.

If the Census Bureau, in the event that the work should be done here, will prepare and furnish copy so that uninterrupted employment can be given to our compositors, and proof shall be returned promptly, with few radical alterations, this office will do its share toward the completion of the census reports in time to meet all necessary requirements.

The records of this office will show that the work when completed will be of the highest order and the cost in all respects favorable to the Government, and yet with just compensation to the people employed.

Yours, respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. JOEL P. HEATWOLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Members of the committee will see from this letter that the Government Printing Office is able to do all the work that will be required by the Director of the Census.

Mr. BROMWELL. As I understand it, he is able to do it with the facilities and force he now has. The only thing is that they shall furnish him with copy and corrected proof promptly. If we want it done more rapidly, all we have to do is to give him more men and better facilities.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is proper to say that the Government Printing Office is in a better position to do this work than any office we can reach by contract. It is estimated that the thirteen volumes brought into question by this amendment and the communications which have been made by the Census Committee will comprise 13,035 pages. One hundred men working eight hours a day would set this matter in about 260 days. By working two shifts they could set it in 130 days, while by three shifts of eight hours each this type could be set in less than 100 days. By increasing the force there is no question but what the type for the entire edition of 13,039 pages could be set in less than 50 days.

In order, however, to put these publications all in type it will be necessary that the copy be furnished almost at the same time—that is, that all the copy go into the office at once. It will require to set these pages about 260,000 pounds of type, costing about $90,000, which will give members of the committee some idea of what it will require in a private office to do the work.

Now, there has been something said about the delay in the published reports of the Eleventh Census. At one time during the printing of those reports there was tied up in the Government Printing Office over 26 tons of type waiting proof and revised proof and additional copy from the Census Bureau.

Mr. GAINES. Then it was not the fault of the Public Printer.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Evidently not.

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if there is, within his knowledge as a practical printer, in the United States any establishment which could hold up that large amount of type while waiting for copy, if it had the contract to do the printing?

Mr. HEATWOLE. There may be, but not to my knowledge. I understand there is a very extensive nonunion establishment in Indiana which might do some of this work, but as to its capacity I know nothing. Now, assuming that this 26 tons of type was nonpareil, the value of this metal tied up would be between twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars. It will be noted, therefore, that if a private individual or corporation is to do this work he or it would necessarily require additional type, additional machinery, and, of course, additional space.

It is true that a contract could undoubtedly be made with a private individual or a corporation to publish these reports at a certain price, including minor changes from the Census Office, but it would not be possible to make a contract that would properly protect the interests of the United States if the methods under which copy and proofs were prepared under the preceding census is to be repeated in the coming census. That is to say, in many instances it was almost entirely rewritten on the proof and changes made in the complete proof which required alterations in the stereotyped plates. This not only occasions much delay, but is very expensive, and extras would increase the cost indefinitely.

Now, from the report that I have on my desk from the Public Printer, and which I may send to the Clerk's desk later to have read, I notice that one of the books of the last census of 794 pages was put in type but afterwards was "killed"—that is, the type was distributed and had to be reset. That is to say, new copy had to be furnished before the work could be finished. Of course it is required that the Census Office shall be duly diligent in furnishing copy and in correcting proof, if it is expected that the Printing Office will get the work out on time. There are two sides to this question. I want to call attention to the statement of Mr. King, chief statistician of the Census Bureau, and alluded to by the gentleman from Illinois. He spoke about one of the reports on manufactures requiring thirteen months and twenty-six days, and Vital Statistics No. 4 requiring over sixteen months to be printed.

It is proper to say that we have been unable to obtain any data in regard to why this delay was occasioned. That work was done under another administration of the Printing Office. But the gentleman failed to read the statement showing that Population No. 1 was gotten out in two months and eighteen days; Population No. 2, in one month and two days. And as an illustration of what that work is, I will show you one of the volumes on vital and social statistics. It is this large volume which I hold in my hand, a volume consisting of tabulated matter, called two-price matter. That is, where there are 10,000 ems composition, nonpareil, on a page, it would count for the printer 20,000 ems composition. This is one of the books. I do not know how many there were in the edition, but that was gotten out in a remarkably short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I should like a little more time.
 Mr. LANDIS. I ask that the gentleman be given time to conclude his remarks.
 Mr. HEATWOLE. I should like to have a letter from the Public Printer read.
 Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield ten minutes longer to the gentleman.
 The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE] is recognized for ten minutes.
 Mr. HEATWOLE. I insist that there is practically no limit to the work which can be done by the Government Printing Office. It seems to me that every report required by the Director of the Census can be gotten out in the time needed to meet the requirements of the Census Office. But in view of the fact that something has been said in relation to delays, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a statement from the Public Printer in regards to those delays.
 The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
 OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
 Washington, D. C., January 16, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 13, inclosing copy of memoranda furnished by the Director of the Census estimating the length of time which will be required to print certain reports of the Twelfth Census, and a statement showing the time occupied by this office in printing certain reports of the Eleventh Census, and stating that you should like to have any data I may be able to give in regard to the progress of the work on the last-named reports, and whether or not copy and final proofs of such reports were promptly furnished by the Census Office.

Appended hereto is a statement showing the dates upon which copy was furnished to this office of the following-named reports of the Eleventh Census, the date upon which the final plate proofs were marked "ready for press," and the date upon which the completed work was delivered to the Department of the Interior: Population, 1890, Part I; Population, 1890, Part II; Manufactures, 1890, Part I; Manufactures, 1890, Part II; Manufactures, 1890, Part III; Vital Statistics, 1890, Part I; Vital Statistics, 1890, Part II; Vital Statistics, 1890, Part III; Vital Statistics, 1890, Part IV; Agriculture, 1890; Compendium, 1890, Part I; Compendium, 1890, Part II; Compendium, 1890, Part III.

I also inclose herewith copies of communications from this office, calling the attention of the officials having charge of the printing of the reports of the Eleventh Census to the delays of the Census Office in furnishing copy, returning proofs, the submission of incorrect copy—necessitating many changes in proofs—the making of alterations in matter after it had been stereotyped, etc.

I desire to call your particular attention to the copy of a letter addressed by me July 27, 1893, to the Acting Superintendent of Census, stating that there were in the possession of his office, at that date, the proofs of 2,327 pages and 151 galleys of matter belonging to the Final Reports of the Eleventh Census. The type in which these 2,327 pages and 151 galleys of matter was set weighed 52,540 pounds, or more than 26 tons. I also wish to invite your attention to my letter of May 13, 1897, to Hon. Carroll D. Wright, in charge of the Eleventh Census, submitting a statement of the condition of the work of the publications of the Eleventh Census, stating my wish to complete the work at the earliest possible moment, and requesting him to lend his good offices to that end, and to his reply thereto, dated May 14, 1897.

There were 704 pages of the report on Indians put in type, which matter was afterwards "killed" and new copy, making 683 printed pages, furnished. (See letter from Census, dated March 18, 1894.)

It will be seen by reference to the above statement and correspondence that, with the exception of Part II of the Report on Manufactures and Part IV of the Report on Vital Statistics, there was no great delay upon the part of this office in promptly executing the work, while the copy was not furnished in from two to six years after the taking of the census.

The chief of the printing division of the Census Office, in a letter addressed by him to the Director of the Census January 13, 1900, a copy of which was received with your communication, gives the following as an estimate of the various chief statisticians as to the number of volumes, pages, and editions of the reports of the Twelfth Census named: Population, 2 volumes, 2,103 pages, 50,000 copies; compendium, 3 volumes, 3,210 pages, 37,000 copies; agriculture, 2 volumes, 1,848 pages, 25,000 copies; manufactures, 4 volumes, 3,378 pages, 25,000 copies; vital statistics, 2 volumes, 2,500 pages, 25,000 copies.

The following is an estimate of the number of employees which will be required to print and bind these reports within three hundred working days, provided there be no delays in furnishing copy and proof reading on the part of the Census Office.

Working two shifts, eight hours each, it is estimated that the work can be done in 150 working days; three shifts, eight hours each, 100 working days. By increasing the force this time could be shortened, if necessary. It is observed that the chief of the printing division, Census Office, estimates that the work can be completed in 306 working days with the following force: One hundred and twelve mechanics, 30 laborers, 48 girls; total, 190. After a careful consideration of the subject this force is deemed entirely inadequate.

Respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

HON. JOEL P. HEATWOLE,
 Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed in this letter that the Census Office had proofs of 2,327 pages and 151 galleys of matter belonging to final reports. This matter was tied up in the Government Printing Office, and really is more type than is usually found in a large printing office owned by a private individual or corporation. It will be noted in the letter read that attention is called to a letter directed to Mr. Wright, Acting Superintendent of the Census, from the Public Printer, in which he showed that numerous pages of matter had been set up for the Census Office and then killed or ordered to be thrown in, and the attention of the Census Office was directed to the fact that such proceedings were extravagant and unwarranted. Repeatedly the attention of the Census Office was called to the fact that proofs were being delayed, and that consequently the work on the printing was delayed.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Who was responsible for the killing of that matter?

Mr. HEATWOLE. The Census Office was responsible for the killing of it. If the Government Printing Office can not do this work in the time asked or prescribed under the provisions of the census act, I do not see how it is possible for any private printing office or office owned by a corporation to print it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I ask unanimous consent to append, in addition to my remarks, a statement which I hold in my hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print a statement in addition to his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

Statement showing the dates upon which copy was furnished to the Government Printing Office of certain reports of the Eleventh Census, the dates upon which the final plate proofs were marked "Ready for press," and the dates upon which the completed work was delivered to the Department of the Interior.

POPULATION, 1890, PART I.

First installment of copy received December 20, 1892; additional copy was received December 27, 1892, April 18 and 19, 1894, June 8, 1894, and July 9, 1894; copy commencing Table 23 withdrawn November 13, 1893 (pages 914 to 1021), and returned December 8, 1893; title, contents, etc., received March 13, 1895.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received April 13, 1895. Presswork begun March 23, 1894, about one year in advance of volume being completed for press.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior July 1, 1895, and within three months after the return of the final plate proofs.

POPULATION, 1890, PART II.

First installment only of copy (1-877) received December 9, 1893; future installments as follows: 1-292, December 1, 1893; 1-238, December 4, 1893; 239-431, February 25, 1897; 432-433, March 12, 1897; 434-550, May 15, 1897; 551-708, May 27, 1897; 1-58, May 27, 1897 (title, etc.); 1-vii, 1-141, May 27, 1897 (plate matter).

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," not received until July 31, 1897. Presswork begun June 15, 1897, or before the final plate proof was returned.

Within thirty-four days from receipt of final proof this volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior, September 2, 1897.

MANUFACTURES, 1890, PART I.

First installment of copy was received February 13, 1893; second installment received June 4, 1893; preliminary matter received September 10, 1893. Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received October 23, 1893.

Presswork begun February 13, 1893. This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior May 5, 1896, within seventy-one days after receipt of final plate proof.

MANUFACTURES, 1890, PART II.

First installment of copy was received December 28, 1893; second installment received March 21, 1894; preliminary matter received November 8, 1894. Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received March 27, 1895.

Presswork begun March 27, 1894. This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior May 23, 1896, fourteen months after receipt of final plate proofs.

MANUFACTURES, 1890, PART III.

Copy for preliminary matter not received until March 6, 1895. Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received March 23, 1895. Plate correction received March 23, 1895; proof submitted and received in return March 30, 1895.

Presswork begun July 30, 1894, about nine months in advance of completion of the volume. This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior June 9, 1896, within seventy days after return of final plate proofs.

VITAL STATISTICS, 1890, PART I.

First installment of copy received December 31, 1896; Table No. 26 (folios 1250 to 1271) was withdrawn May 14, 1897; preliminary matter received July 31, 1897.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received September 29, 1897. Presswork begun September 8, 1897, in advance of completion of volume for press.

This volume was delivered January 27, 1898 (within four months after receipt of final plate proof), to the Department of the Interior.

VITAL STATISTICS, 1899, PART II.

First installment of copy received June 7, 1895; preliminary matter received October 19, 1896.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received September 23, 1896. Presswork begun November 9, 1896, in advance of completion of the volume for press.

This volume was delivered January 8, 1897 (within four months after final plate proofs were returned), to the Department of the Interior.

VITAL STATISTICS, 1899, PART III.

First installment of copy received November 23, 1892; title, contents, etc., received November 17, 1894.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received December 7, 1894. Presswork begun November 27, 1893, almost one year in advance of completion of volume for press.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior January, 22, 1895, and within sixty days after return of final plate proofs.

VITAL STATISTICS, 1899, PART IV.

First installment of copy was received August 2, 1894; title, contents, etc., received June 5, 1895.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received July 20, 1895. Presswork begun September 12, 1896.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior December 12, 1896.

AGRICULTURE, 1899.

First installment of copy was received October 6, 1894; title, contents, etc., received April 25, 1895.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received May 23, 1895. Presswork begun October 31, 1895.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior February 24, 1896, within two hundred and seventy-five days from the time of the receipt of final plate proof.

COMPENDIUM, 1899, PART I.

First installment of copy was received November 19, 1892; title, contents, etc., received November 22, 1892.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received January 24, 1893. Presswork begun May 17, 1893.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior October 14, 1893.

COMPENDIUM, 1899, PART II.

First installment of copy was received —; title, contents, etc., received April 14, 1894.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received May 12, 1894. Presswork begun December 30, 1893.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior May 26, 1894.

COMPENDIUM, 1899, PART III.

First installment of copy was received September 23, 1896; title, contents, etc., received March 17, 1897.

Final plate proof, marked "Ready for press," received May 22, 1897. Presswork begun May 8, 1897.

This volume was delivered to the Department of the Interior July 1, 1897.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1898.

SIR: I return herewith proofs of pages 505 and 745 of the Final Report on Mining Industries in the United States, received from you this day with certain corrections, and have to inform you that these pages were stereotyped some time ago.

Very respectfully,

W. H. COLLINS,
Chief Clerk.

Dr. O. C. KETCHAM,
Chief Printing Division, Census Office.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, January 22, 1898.

SIR: Referring to your letter of January 21, 1898, returning proof of pages 505 and 745 of the Final Report on Mineral Industries in the United States, with the information that these pages were stereotyped some time ago, I have to advise you that the corrections noted were received two days ago from the author, Dr. Day, and are believed to be necessary for the proper presentation of the report.

Of course, I know it would be much better if all corrections could be made before stereotyping, but you are aware that corrections are frequently made after that process, and these proofs are herewith returned, with the request that the corrections noted be made.

Very respectfully,

O. C. KETCHAM,
Special Agent in Charge, Eighteenth Division.

Mr. W. H. COLLINS,
Chief Clerk, Government Printing Office.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, June 10, 1898.

My DEAR SIR: I am glad to be able to inform you that about 700 pages of the report will be ready for plating next week, viz: Insurance Business in the United States, 468 pages; Pauperism and Crime, 265 pages; Compendium, 147 pages. The other proofs are first page proofs, and while they can not be sent for plating next week, I have given very imperative directions for pushing forward the work as rapidly as possible. I am watching this daily and will not allow a moment of unnecessary delay. At the same time I hope you will be good enough to use every endeavor possible to get as many of these reports in type as may be practicable.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT P. PORTER,
Superintendent of Census.

Mr. H. T. BRIAN,
Foreman of Printing, Government Printing Office.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1898.

SIR: There are now in the possession of the Census Office proofs of 2,327 pages and 151 galleys of matter belonging to the final reports of the Eleventh Census. Until a large portion of these proofs have been returned here it will be impossible to put in type any more of this work.

Very respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

JAMES H. WARDLE,
Acting Superintendent of Census, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, July 31, 1898.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 27th instant, and in reply would state that I appreciate thoroughly the many disadvantages this office labors under in having such a great amount of type locked up in your office, and I shall use my utmost endeavors to have a large portion of the matter released within a very few days.

I have had personal interviews with all the special agents and chiefs of division having matter in hand, and they have given me assurance that within the next ten days they will be able to furnish corrected revises of several hundred pages of proof.

Instructions will be issued at once to all employees having printed matter in charge to pass upon the same more rapidly than has been the practice heretofore.

Very respectfully,

J. H. WARDLE,
Acting Superintendent of Census.

Hon. F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, March 16, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to respectfully request that the plates now in existence in your office for the final report on Indians be withheld until further orders.

Copy for a revised report will be furnished, and there will be no economy in using the plates now in existence for this revised report.

Respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Hon. FRANK W. PALMER, Public Printer.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., September 15, 1894.

SIR: I have before me proofs of Appendix, Fire Department and Water Supply for Fire Purposes, pages 1130 to 1237, inclusive, census matter, received in this office on the 13th instant from your bureau, marked "killed."

I find that the original copy of this matter was received here on July 2, and that three separate proofs in connection with it have been sent you. In view of the fact that I am, under the statute, compelled to exercise due economy in the execution of public printing, I inquire if it is possible to secure through your office a definite and final completion of copy now in hand or to be sent here by your authority to appear in the census publications, that such waste and loss may be saved to the Government in future.

The facilities of this office are required for the publication of matter which should reach the public. It needs no argument to show the misuse of funds when this office is engaged in the preparation of hundreds and thousands of pages of matter, supposed to be based upon statistical information collected under authority of law, and then marked "killed" after the third proof reaches your hands.

I shall not feel at liberty to take up any further census copy until it comes from your office with an assurance of its genuineness and completion as a Government publication.

Respectfully,

TH. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer.

Hon. CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Acting Superintendent of Census, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, October 5, 1894.

SIR: Your letter of the 15th of September relating to imperfect copy, etc., was duly received.

Since my return to Washington I have given it very careful consideration. I am in entire sympathy with your efforts to secure clean copy before composition, and since being in charge of this office I have done all in my power to secure this result; but with the multitudinous branches of the Census Office, several officers collecting information along kindred lines, I find that each has worked independently and that afterwards the inharmonies of their statements have appeared. In the case you refer to in yours of September 15 the matter was "killed" by the author.

I shall do everything possible to meet your requirements, but now and then shall be obliged, in the interest of economy, of harmony, and of the credit of the Government, to "kill" matter.

Inclosed you will find a copy of an order issued March 31, 1894, bearing upon this very matter.

I gave the chief clerk of your office yesterday verbally a very full statement relative to the condition of matters in the Census Office. I trust you will find everything fairly satisfactory.

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge.

Mr. TH. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer, Washington, D. C.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., September 13, 1896.

SIR: I desire to inform you that this office is awaiting copy and proofs in connection with census volumes on Vital Statistics, Part II, and Population, Part I. We are not only ready but anxious to receive the matter and complete the work.

If other matter concerning new volumes or parts of volumes of census matter is to be furnished this office, we would be glad to receive same at once and progress the work to completion.

Respectfully, yours,

TH. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer.

Hon. CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge of Eleventh Census.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., September 17, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your favor of the 16th, informing me that your office is "awaiting copy and proofs in connection with census volumes on Vital Statistics, Part II, and Population, Part II, and that if other matter concerning new volumes is to be furnished you would be glad to receive the same," I have to say that I hope by the 1st of the ensuing month to furnish you with all copy pertaining to the volumes you mention, as well as the copy for the third volume of the Compendium. The clerks in the division have remained at work, without vacation, during the summer with this end in view, and I see no reason at present why you should not have the copy, or the greater part of it, for all the remaining census volumes, viz, the ones you mention and third volume of the Compendium, within the next fifteen days.

As to proofs, I have to say that there are now in the office only 168 pages of proof, all of which will be forwarded to-morrow or next day. In this connection I beg to say that I do not think there has been any delay here.

Very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge, etc.

Hon. TH. E. BENEDICT, Public Printer.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1897.

DEAR SIR: The following is a statement of the condition of the work on the publications of the Eleventh Census in this office:

Report on Population, Part II. Cast (xiii-clxxv, 1-627) February 18, 1896, to May 10, 1897; plate proof (1-624) sent February 28, 1896, to May 12, 1897; plate proof returned for printing, pages 1-315; waiting on return of remainder of plate proofs and furnishing of title, contents, and index; galley proof first sent on this volume January 23, 1897; work suspended for some time owing to delay in furnishing better part of copy, which was not received until February 25 and March 12, 1897.

Vital and Social Statistics, Part I. About 260 galleys, proof out April 7 to May 12; no proof returned. Census Office gave us to understand that they were not prepared and would not read proof further than to overlook plate matter; galley proof sent for examination of titles and headings only.

Compendium, Part III. Cast (i-vii, 1-1150) January 28 to March 30; plate proof sent February 16 to April 7; returned in part (1-475) March 18 to May 5; now waiting on return of plate proofs; press started May 8, and unless plate proofs are returned more rapidly will have to stop press.

It is my desire to complete this work at the earliest possible moment, and have to request you to lend your good offices to this end.

Respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor,
in Charge of Eleventh Census, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of yours of yesterday, giving a statement of the condition of the publications of the Eleventh Census and requesting my good offices in completing the census work at the earliest possible moment.

In reply, I have to say that the embarrassment at the present time is the result of an arrangement made some time ago with the Printing Office, to the effect that the proof reading on the census copy should be done there, the Census Office only revising the arrangement of headings, etc. This arrangement has not proved satisfactory, as material errors were found, which made reading by copy after the plating was done desirable. Nevertheless, we have driven matters to the utmost extent with the very small force left after disbanding practically the proof-reading section.

This morning all the galley proofs of Part I of Vital and Social Statistics were returned to the Printing Office, so there will be no particular delay on this volume. The thing which embarrasses you most, I judge, is Part III of the Compendium. I have now loaned the Census Office the services of four proof readers, and shall try to secure some from the Department of the Interior for temporary service, in order to push this volume to completion. All that is to be done is simply to read the plate proof by copy to avoid errors.

Part II of the Report on Population will be pushed in the same way. There is copy which will make about forty printed pages still to be sent to Printing Office, as I am informed.

I am exceedingly gratified to know that your office will do everything in its power to complete the census at the earliest possible moment, and I beg to assure you that everything in my power shall also be done. I do not hesitate to say that so far as the Census Office is concerned the last page of copy should have been out of our hands more than a year ago, and would have been had it not been for influences entirely beyond my control.

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in Charge of the Eleventh Census.

Hon. F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1897.

DEAR SIR: That the Report of the Eleventh Census on Population, Part II, may be printed and bound without further delay, this office would be glad to have you complete, at your earliest convenience, pages 628 to 824, both inclusive.

Respectfully,

W. H. COLLINS,
Chief Clerk.

CHIEF OF CENSUS DIVISION,
Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION,
Washington, July 16, 1897.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 15th instant, relative to Part II of the Census Report on Population, just received.

I am trying to hasten this along as rapidly as possible; you have plate proof complete up to page 627; first proof of pages 628-743 has been returned and second proof asked for, of which pages 628-672 have been received. (673-699 received since above.)

First proof of pages 744-824 has been returned and second proof of 16 pages asked for, the remainder being passed to plate.

We are now clear of everything except such second proof as has been called for, and this will be disposed of just as rapidly as you can send it, being compared for correction only.

The new matter (628-744) will have to be read in the plate by copy, and arrangements have been made to secure additional assistance and put it through very quickly. I hope we can get entirely through with it in a very few days.

Respectfully,

W. A. KING,
Chief Census Division.

Mr. W. H. COLLINS,
Chief Clerk, Government Printing Office.

Mr. RUSSELL. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois now occupy some time?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide against contingencies, and that is its sole and only purpose. It involves no question of etiquette between bureaus. The respective bureaus of the Government have no legal or vested right in any particular part of the public service. This is solely and entirely a business proposition.

Some reflection has been made upon the conduct of the committee because it omitted to invite the Public Printer before it to give a statement.

I believe every member of the committee is and was of the opinion that the Public Printing Office has the capacity, or may be given the capacity, to publish the census reports within the time required by the original act; but to provide against contingencies that may possibly arise the committee deemed it wise to give this power to the Director of the Census. Objection has been made that it violates a long-established custom and introduces a dangerous precedent.

There is some force, I concede, Mr. Chairman, in that argument; but when the committee keeps in mind that this is a special kind of work and that the time of its consummation is arbitrarily limited, it seems to me that it is proper for Congress to confer upon the head of this great Bureau this extraordinary power. The man who has charge of this work has been selected on account of his executive ability, because of his integrity of character, and we all know that in all the great functions of government discretion must ultimately be vested in the integrity and the wisdom of some man.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if this amendment shall prevail there will be no difficulty in relation to the printing of these reports, and the probabilities are that they will be printed in the Government Office. The Director of the Census only asks Congress to give him power to contract for this work elsewhere in the event that any contingency should arise that would make it impossible to get the work done at the Government Office. It seems to me, when we view the peculiar features of the case, its unusual aspect, the grant of authority can not stand as a precedent that would authorize permanent bureaus to procure power from Congress to contract here, there, and elsewhere over the country for work that ought properly to be done by the Public Printer.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Why not vest this discretion in the Public Printer? If he can not comply with the law with the force at his disposal, why not give him the authority to contract with other parties?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My answer to that is that the Director of the Census has been made personally and officially responsible for this work, and the Public Printer, if he does the work, must do it out of the appropriation for the Census Bureau. It is census work, and the Director of the Census is responsible for it. His appropriation must pay for it, and he is naturally and logically the one who should have the discretion to determine when a contingency arose that would justify him in going elsewhere under the power that this bill confers.

Mr. Chairman, after having listened to the able and exhaustive argument of my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL], I can still see no just and sufficient reason why this authority ought not to be granted under the peculiar conditions of the case. If we expect to get these volumes out by the 1st of July, 1902, we must give some one the power, almost an absolute power, if he should see fit to exercise it, to meet the date that has been arbitrarily fixed by Congress.

It is likely that if the Public Printer should set apart a force of 100 or 200 men and should procure other facilities and devote them exclusively to the work of printing and binding the reports, the entire work could be done in the Government Printing Office. But the fear has been entertained by some members of the Committee on Census that the Public Printer might conclude that he would be justified in using his regular force in printing the census reports when they were not required for his regular duties, for the duties bearing directly and personally upon him as the head of a great department, to be paid for out of his own appropriation. And this provision is simply to meet contingencies. If the Government Printing Office has the capacity, and the Public Printer has the disposition, there will be no occasion for the exercise of the power conferred upon the Director of the Census under this bill. But if the Government Office does not have the capacity, or if the Public Printer should not have the disposition, then I believe every man on this floor will agree with me in the conclusion that the Director of the Census ought to have the discretion that the bill confers upon him.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will it interrupt my colleague if I ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. You made reference to the fact that this work was to be done out of the appropriation given to the Census Office. Now, why give the Director of the Census this power before we give him the appropriation? Why is it proper that we should now authorize him to do contract work before we have given him any money to print anywhere, either in the Government Printing Office or outside of that office?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, we should give him power before we make the appropriation, because appropriations are always based upon duty, upon what the law requires of a bureau, and not upon a speculative possibility.

Mr. RUSSELL. He has the duty of doing that. That is in the general law. This is a perversion of or limitation upon his duties.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Director of the Census said to our committee that this power ought to be conferred upon him, and that he ought to have it now, so that he could be taking the preliminary steps that may be necessary to finally determine that question. I do not know how long a time he would require to ascertain whether the facilities of the Public Printer were such that he could satisfactorily do the work. I do not know how long a time he might need to arrange with some private institution to do the work, in the event that he had to resort to that alternative.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Why should we give to the Director of the Census power to pass judgment upon the capacity of the Printing Office?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am sorry I have not time to answer the question.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me there are many questions sought to be presented here in the discussion that have no proper place in the consideration of this bill. I have always been friendly and have always espoused the cause of labor wherever its interests were at stake. I have always been friendly to the printers' union, to the typesetters' union, and to all that great class of laborers.

Now, the bill before the committee this afternoon presents in none of its features any question involving any of the rights of labor or of the labor-union cause. The value of the work of the census depends largely upon the prompt and expeditious manner in which the results of the work of that Bureau are disseminated and placed in the hands of the general public.

Now, as members well know, the work of the last census, as well as the work of the census of 1880, and many volumes of various particular parts of the work, which the public were interested in, most especially, were not distributed and were not accessible for three, four, five, and six years after the census was taken, and for all practical purposes the publication and dissemination of reports after that length of time are useless.

Now, to avoid a repetition of that, in the Fifty-fifth Congress a clause was passed in the census bill which provided that the publication of these reports should be completed not later than the 1st of July, 1903. The Director of the Census is made responsible by law for the completion of the publication and distribution of these reports within that time.

It is contended and urged that the Public Printer was not called before the committee. Suppose, for the purposes of the argument, we concede the strongest case that the Public Printer can possibly make, and that is that he could complete the work; that he has the facilities with which to complete the work within the time specified.

There is no question here but that the sum and substance of the fourth clause as to that discretion is this: That if by peradventure, from any cause, the Public Printer finds himself unable, and the Director should come to the conclusion that the Public Printer will not be able, to complete the distribution and dissemination of these reports within the time required by law, then, and in that event only, is the Director of the Census authorized to contract outside. I think, gentlemen, that that is a just and reasonable request.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question that the other gentleman failed to answer for want of time?

Mr. GRIFFITH. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Why is it necessary to give to the Director of the Census power to pass judgment upon the capacity of the Printing Office?

Mr. GRIFFITH. Because, by law, he is charged with the duty of completing and distributing these reports by the 1st of July, 1903. He is an executive officer—the officer who, by law, is charged with this responsibility. I have confidence that the Director will not abuse the discretion we lodge with him. The people are anxious that the results of the census be published and ready for circulation at the earliest possible date.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, before I say anything else, that I have had no telegram, no letters from anybody with respect to this measure. I made up my mind when I read this bill, a few days ago, that this was a dangerous provision and one that ought not to pass. This question is, as the gentleman from Indiana on my right stated a few moments ago, a pure business question. It is not a question of Democracy or Republicanism. It is not a contest between the Public Printer and the Director of the Census Bureau. It is a pure business question. The United States Government has a certain amount of printing to do. The United States Government is the proprietor of the finest printing office on the face of the earth. A distinguished Englishman, who was here not long ago, said that, after having gone into the workings of this Government in all of its departments, he left Washington with such admiration for the Government Printing Office as did not extend to any one or all of the other Departments put together.

Now, the proposition is that this proprietor of the best printing office in the world shall employ somebody else to do its printing, and shall employ that somebody else to do that printing, involving an expenditure of millions of dollars, at the discretion of the head of a bureau.

I want to say here, now, that I know no gentleman connected with the United States Government for whom I have a higher respect or greater esteem than the Director of the Census. His integrity is beyond question; his ability and competency to discharge the duties of his office are beyond question. I want to say the same as to the Public Printer. But the United States has now, and has had for unnumbered years, a policy on this subject, and the policy is to place the responsibility for Government printing in a single hand; to make a single man responsible, and that man is the head of the Public Printing Office—the Public Printer. I know of no reason why, in this particular instance, the rule heretofore followed, the wise, common-sense, business rule, should be abandoned.

The only question that ought to influence us is, Is the Public Printing Office sufficiently equipped to do this work? The answer to that is to be found in the experience of the past. It has been demonstrated here that so far as the Eleventh Census was concerned, in every single instance where there was a delay, the delay was attributable to the Census Office; and in every single instance when there was no delay on the part of the Census Office the work had been well and expeditiously done by the Public Printer.

Now, let me read you an extract from the last report of the Public Printer:

Notwithstanding the unusual and unprecedented demands made upon this office by several of the Departments of the Government in consequence of the war with Spain, I am pleased to state that its facilities were such as to enable it to promptly fill all orders, and that no complaint has been received that the operations of any Department were impeded or delayed one moment on account of the failure on the part of this office to expeditiously execute all requisitions made upon it.

That in a time of war, when every Department of this Government was calling upon the Printing Office with unusual and extraordinary demands.

He goes on to say:

The most striking illustration during the past year of the capabilities of the office for executing hurried orders was the printing of the message of the President transmitting the report of the naval court of inquiry upon the destruction of the U. S. battleship Maine. This publication consisted of 238 pages of text, 24 full-page engravings, and 1 lithograph in colors, and although the originals of the illustrations were not in the possession of the office until 3 o'clock p. m. of March 23, and the manuscript of the text was not received until 6 o'clock p. m. of the same day, complete printed copies, in paper covers, were placed upon the desks of Senators and Representatives by 10 o'clock of the following morning.

[Applause.]

A feat incapable of performance by any other printing office within the bounds of the United States.

A MEMBER. Or the world.

Mr. DALZELL. Or the world. But, not to deal with generalities, how about this particular case upon which we are to-day sitting as a jury? The Public Printer says, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Printing:

In accordance with your request made to me this morning, I will state that the Government Printing Office is equipped with material and employees to execute promptly the reports of the Census Bureau for the Twelfth Census in the time required.

Not only that, but he goes on to say that if you allot these contracts to outside parties you not only deprive the Government Printing Office of the doing of that which it is capable of doing, but you turn into disuse and leave unemployed the Government property in that Printing Office.

It seems to me—

The Public Printer continues—

that the allotment of contracts for this printing to private and corporate parties would leave the superior facilities already provided by the Government in this office to be unused.

As a plain business proposition, to be dealt with by business men upon the same basis with which they would deal with their own, I say that this fourth section of this bill ought to be stricken out.

Now, just one word more. It is suggested here, by way of compromise, that some amendment should be offered as a substitute, which shall say that the Public Printer, upon the request of the Director of the Census, shall do thus and so. Why on the request of the Director of the Census?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like one minute more.

Mr. RUSSELL. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield one minute.

Mr. DALZELL. Strike out the fourth section, and it gives the Printer under existing law the charge of this work. Now, why divide the responsibility? Why say, on the request of the Director of the Census, he shall do thus and so? Why leave it to the Public Printer to say, hereafter, that this work was not done because the Director of the Census did not request it; and the Director of the Census to make an excuse that the Public Printer did not do thus and so? Why not abide by the ancient landmarks and stand by the policy that we have heretofore established? Place your responsibility in a single hand—make a single man answerable for the use of the instruments, sufficient and adequate in themselves, with which we have provided him. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. How much time does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WILSON] desire?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WILSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the legislation so far adopted concerning the census, it is the purpose that this census shall be a departure from its predecessor; that it shall be nonpartisan; that it shall be prompt, and that it shall be accurate. Now, this provision which has been incorporated into the proposed bill is designed solely to accomplish one of these purposes, to wit, that this census report as to those four schedules shall be promptly printed and promptly disseminated.

The opposition to it seems to me to revolve around the personality of the Public Printer. I have nothing to say against the Public Printer. I know him slightly, I know him favorably, and I am satisfied he is as good a Public Printer as we have ever had. But we can not bring this debate down to a matter of the personality of either of these gentlemen—the Director of the Census or the Public Printer. It is, as all parties agree, a plain business proposition.

Now, there are certain fixed conditions that underlie this matter. Those conditions are that the time is fixed, beyond which the Director can not go, at which time these books shall be published. Another condition is that, by the admission of the Public Printer, read in your hearing this afternoon, the present establishment of the Government Printing Office is utterly inadequate to do that printing within the prescribed limit, because, in his own language, it would take three hundred days to do this work. In other words, if that work should be given to him January 1, 1902, it would be January, 1903, before the Public Printer would be ready to deliver the goods to the Director of the Census.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Suppose he increases his force?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. The third condition is of importance to the people of this country, that they should be promptly supplied with the results of the census. Now, what is proposed to be done by the amendment or the substitute which I shall offer for this amendment? It is proposed that the same time limit shall be in effect imposed upon the Public Printer as has already been imposed upon the Director of the Census.

Both of them are public servants. Both of them are amenable to legislation which this Congress may enact. Congress has already said to the Director, "You must give these books to the public by July 1, 1902." Congress has never said—and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to that fact—Congress has never said to the Public Printer, "You must get these books printed by July 1, 1902."

The light of past experience shows us that when the proofs were promptly delivered it took the Public Printer over one year to deliver the reports.

I do not refer to the present Public Printer necessarily, but I refer to the occupant of that official position at that time. It took him over one year to deliver the printed goods after the proofs were delivered to him. What guaranty have we that the same limit of time will not be consumed in 1902?

What objection can any friend of the Public Printer raise to this Congress, in the exercise of its power and in the exercise of its duty to the American people, saying to him, "As we have required of the Director of the Census, so we require of you, the Public Printer, that this work shall be done within this prescribed limit?"

Who but the Director of the Census knows what facilities will be required, what additional force will be required to enable him to have this done before July 1, 1902? I do not believe in allowing one public servant to dictate to another of equal grade. Neither does this amendment which I propose make any such provision. Mr. Chairman, when the time comes I shall offer as a substitute for section 4 the amendment which I now ask to have read. I do not see how any man who really wants to see this work done within the time, and who does not wish to see an impossible condition of affairs forced upon the Director of the Census, can object to it. I ask the Clerk to read my proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the request of the Director of the Census, the Public Printer shall provide such additional facilities as said Director may request to enable him to comply with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," and amendments thereof, which printing shall be done under the supervision of the Public Printer.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, as the reading of that shows, nothing is taken away from the Public Printer. The same power and the same privileges that he now has are accorded to him, or, rather, are left with him. The only additional provision is that if the Director of the Census should find that the facilities of the Public Printer are not such as to enable the Public Printer to do the printing within the specified time, then, not at the dictation of the Director of the Census, but at the request of the Director of the Census, the Public Printer is authorized and directed to make an additional equipment, to furnish the additional force, which will enable the Director of the Census to carry out the law. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I only desire time in which to present an amendment, which, as I understand, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WILSON] has already suggested.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is not the same amendment, is it?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. No; it is a different amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, in my time I desire to have read this amendment, which I wish to offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of section 4 as proposed insert:

"Sec. 4. The Public Printer, on the request of the Director of the Census, shall establish in the office of the Twelfth Census or elsewhere in the city of Washington a branch printing office, which shall be under the direction and control of the Public Printer, of sufficient capacity to meet the demands of the Director of the Census in the publication of the census reports."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is in exact conformity to the present law, which says that all branch printing offices that have been or may be established shall be as I have directed in that amendment. This amendment of mine bridges over the whole trouble between the Director of the Census and the Public Printer, Mr. Palmer.

It is due to the Director of the Census that when we press him, as we have under the law, for certain reports or documents to be issued at a certain time it is nothing but right to give him the privilege of saying to the Public Printer, "This must be done within this time." Now, the Public Printer, under this amendment of mine, has nothing to do but just establish a branch office and turn over from his own office such printers, binders, and other employees as may be necessary to do this work in the prescribed time, on the request of the Director of the Census. This ends the whole fight between the two gentlemen and between the friends of the two gentlemen and it is in perfect conformity with the law on printing, as the most of you are well aware.

Mr. COWHERD. Would that make any additional cost?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No additional cost, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield half of my remaining time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] and the remaining half to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. RYAN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to delay the printing and binding of the census reports or in any way retard their publication. But I am opposed to the fourth section of this bill because I believe it to be unwise and unnecessary legislation. In order to obtain some information that I, as a member of this committee, was unable to secure from the committee, I directed a letter to the Public Printer, and I now send the reply to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1900.

SIR: In answer to your letter of January 17, I have the honor to state that the Government Printing Office was created, supplied, and is maintained for the purpose of executing all printing and binding required by the Government.

including the printing and binding of the reports of the census, and that it is well equipped to turn out the work with sufficient speed and in a satisfactory and meritorious manner.

Indeed, section 87 of the act of January 12, 1895 (Stat. 28, page 622), provides that "all printing, binding, and blank books for the Senate and House of Representatives and for the executive and judicial departments shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except in cases otherwise provided by law."

In my judgment this office is fully equipped and able to turn out, with necessary dispatch, the census reports referred to in section 3 of House bill No. 5480.

The leaflet received with your communication is returned herewith.

Respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

HON. W. H. RYAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MR. RYAN of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the information contained in that letter, I believe it to be unwise as a business proposition to adopt this section, because we all know the Government now maintains the largest and best-equipped printing office in the world. I can not conceive how the gentlemen who preceded me on the floor in favor of the adoption of the report made by the chairman of the Census Committee will explain the necessity for going outside of the finest equipped and largest printing concern conducted on either continent when this Printing Office was established for the express purpose of turning out just such publications as is noted in the request of the Director of the Census. The Public Printer declares that he can do the work within the time required.

The contention was made in the committee that, provided the work was contracted for outside of the Government Printing Office, a saving of 25 per cent in the cost would be the result. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, it necessarily denotes that this work is to be performed against the interests of organized labor, a fact which the gentleman from Illinois and others have already denied. Both statements can not be true. The truth of either one is sufficient reason why this report should not be accepted.

The statement that 25 per cent of the cost is to be saved is, perhaps, or at least in my judgment, the nearer to the truth. This saving would not come from any causes of better equipment or grander plant or wider experience that any other printing office, in its entirety, may possess to the disadvantage of the plant, equipment, and experience that is combined in the institution known as the Government Printing Office. This saving must necessarily come from labor, and I feel, and I trust we all feel, that this is a condition we wish to avoid.

The Census Bureau now has in operation, under the law, a printing office, with power to increase its capacity as the necessities may require. The ability and capacity of the Government Printing Office is limited only by the appropriations made by Congress from year to year; and as the Public Printer has stated that he can do this work within the time specified, I can see no reason why we should go elsewhere. In view of this fact, and others heretofore stated, I believe that this amendment, known as section 4, should be stricken from the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MR. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems thus far in the discussion that there is no contention but what the Public Printer can do the work under consideration. He has so stated, and no one thus far has denied his statement, either by letter or otherwise. The next question which presents itself is, Is it wise at this time for us to leave the Government Printing Office and go up and down the streets of our great cities and invite people to enter into competition to do the public-printing business? As I understand, the Printing Office was established for the express purpose of getting away from the very idea sought to be ingrafted in this measure to-day.

As I understand from older members who served in the years from 1850 to 1860, there were scandals connected with the farming out of printing. For the purpose of removing any question of appearance of evil the Government Printing Office was established, and from that day to this there has been no question raised as to its being properly managed, no matter under what Administration the Public Printer may have been appointed. In the last Administration there was no question raised, and in the present Administration there has been no charge of scandal having arisen in the Printing Office. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be unwise for us at this time to go back to the old way and raise again the question of doubt, and get ourselves into discussions, political and scandalous, growing out of the letting of public printing to political favorites or rat offices.

For one I believe in standing by the old landmarks; for one I believe in striking this section entirely from the bill, and allowing this bill to be passed by this House exactly as it was passed by the United States Senate. Let us determine once for all that the Public Printer shall do the public printing of the Government of the United States. If it should turn out that he is not competent or qualified to do this work, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Census can make such a report to the House of Representatives, and we will see that he does that work; and if not, we will ask the President who put him in charge to put him out and put in a man who has the zeal, the energy, the honesty, and the ability to conduct the work of the Government Printing Office. [Applause.]

MR. HOPKINS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

MR. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I want to add my voice on this proposition to those who favor this work being done exclusively by ourselves—by the Government. As has been said, and as the facts and figures that have been presented to this House show, we have equipped ourselves as a nation with the best printing establishment in the known world; and our Public Printer, in charge of this establishment, tells us that he has facilities with which, if we, the legislative branch, will furnish him the money to hire the help, he can dispatch any amount of public printing within any reasonable time that may be asked of him; therefore I say, let us remain within the well-established policy of this nation so far as our public printing is concerned; at least, let it be done by and for ourselves. I think we certainly should do so, and authorize no one to let out this printing either to individuals or corporations. Thanking the gentleman in charge of the bill for his kindness, I will return to him whatever time I have not consumed.

MR. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I crave the indulgence of the committee while I attempt to meet some of the arguments which have been urged by gentlemen who desire to strike out the section of this bill that is proposed by the Census Committee. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the personality of the Public Printer has been injected so prominently in this debate. I realize the power and influence that he may have if he seeks to exert it, and it has been too conspicuous here to-day, in my judgment, for the healthy condition of public legislation. But for all of that, I desire to say, in my judgment, the action of this committee in reporting this amendment is not only not intended and does not in fact encroach upon the power of the Public Printer when properly considered.

The whole argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was that the proposition of the committee was to take this census printing from the Public Printing Office. It does not propose to take any of it away if the Public Printer can do it, as is now claimed by the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York. What is the object of it, then? The object of it is this, that the law imposes on the Director of the Census that this work shall be completed and in the hands of the public on the 1st of July, 1902.

As I stated in my opening remarks, the work is of such a character that the Director of the Census will be unable to put this in the hands of the Printer until the 1st day of January, 1902, leaving practically only six months in which to do all this work. I have shown here that in the previous census eight or nine years were occupied between the Public Printer and the Director of the Census in accomplishing this work. Now, these gentlemen say the Public Printer is ready at all times, under existing conditions, to get this work done. I deny that. I have here a letter written by the chief clerk of the Geological Survey, in which he says:

The publication of our annual reports, monographs, bulletins, and water-supply papers, the work on which is done at and through the Government Printing Office, is, in many cases, not so prompt as is desirable. We believe that the Public Printer does the best he can, but other demands on his office sometimes postpone work on our reports to a vexatious degree. For example, Part V of our Nineteenth Annual Report (consisting of seven volumes), which was transmitted on December 20, 1898, has not yet been delivered.

Very respectfully,

H. C. RIZER, Chief Clerk.

The chief clerk of the Interstate Commerce Commission complains that they are delayed in their publications and that the work is very unsatisfactory. Now, I do not state these facts to criticize the Public Printer, but I state them to the members of this committee to show them that the Public Printer does a vast volume of work, and unless some action be taken to-day to enable the Director of the Census to comply with this law we shall find a repetition, in the publication of these reports, of the Tenth and Eleventh censuses.

If the members of this committee are willing that should be done, then I have no objection to this fourth section, that is proposed by my committee, being stricken out. But if it is proposed to require the Director of the Census to live up to the spirit of the law, then I ask the members here to-day to join with the Committee on the Census to effect a condition so that this work can be done.

MR. HENRY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

MR. HOPKINS. Yes.

MR. HENRY of Mississippi. I want to know why, if the Public Printer says he can do this work, you are not satisfied with it? He says he can do it, and asks the House to be permitted to do it. Why does the gentleman say he can not do it? The Public Printer ought to be the judge of his own business.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will answer the gentleman. The Public Printer has stated in a letter to the Director of the Census that he will take him three hundred working days from the time he receives the proof from the Director of the Census before he can get out the work. Now, take the three shifts, if you please, and make it one hundred days. That does not provide for any contingency. It does not provide for any breakdown or any delay in the printing matter sent by the Director of the Census; in fact, it does not provide for any of the one hundred and one contingencies liable to occur.

What I want to do is this: I do not want to take it away from the Public Printer; I do not suppose it will be taken away; but I want the members of the committee here to take some such action as will insure the publication of these reports within the time limited by law or take away the limitation. One way to do that is to adopt the compromise measure offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

I can say that, while in my judgment it is not so wise a provision as the one contemplated by the Committee on Census, yet in the interests of harmony, and to meet the demands of gentlemen who think the Public Printer ought to do the printing, I am ready to accept that amendment. That leaves it under the control of the Public Printer, but it requires him, from the time Congress acts, when this bill becomes a law, to enlarge his facilities and make his arrangements to meet the extraordinary demands that will be placed upon him by the work that will come from the Census Office.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Suppose the eligibles now out of employment are put to work, is it not possible that the Public Printer can do the work? He is our authorized agent, and he says he can do it, and I want a better reason than the gentleman from Illinois gives why he should take it away from him.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. I have stated again and again that the object was not to take it from the Public Printer, but to make it certain that these volumes will be published within the time prescribed by law.

If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Georgia is adopted, then the Public Printer will at once, if his facilities are not such as make him able to meet these demands—and in my judgment they are not—then he will take such steps as will enable him to do this specific work and get out the publications by the 1st of July, 1902, and he will, if necessary, come to the Committee on Appropriations of the House and Senate and demand the money to be used by him to enlarge the facilities of that department so as to meet what I suggest.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. But the gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I decline to yield further. I am not responsible—

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. If the gentleman is not responsible, then he would better sit down. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should dislike to be responsible for the comprehension of the gentleman. I tried to make my position clear, and I am exceedingly unfortunate, evidently, with him.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. HOPKINS. But I want to say that if I have shown anything, I have shown that there is a necessity existing for prompt action to be taken here, in order to enable the Director of the Census to comply with the requirements of the law.

Now, without taking up any further time, I ask the members of this committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, to look at this matter from the standpoint of the duty that is imposed upon the Director of the Census, where, as I said, a limitation is placed in the law that has never existed in any previous law in regard to the taking of the census of the United States, from the formation of the Government down to the present time.

It is an emergency duty that has been placed upon the Director. It is a duty that can not be met unless we adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] or the amendment proposed by the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the bill by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the power and authority conferred upon the Director of the Census by an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1890, said Director of the Census shall have power, and is hereby authorized, to appoint and employ, as the necessity therefor may arise, 1 purchasing agent, at an annual salary of $2,500; 3 chiefs of division, at an annual salary of $2,000 each; 5 clerks of class 4, 6 clerks of class 3, and 8 clerks of class 2; to employ such number of special agents, not exceeding 35 in all, as may be proper and necessary for the purpose of gathering any information or data in relation to or required by the agricultural schedules; to employ special agents to assist the supervisors in large cities whenever he may deem it proper, in connection with the work of preparation for, or during the progress of, the enumeration, or in connection with the reenumeration of any district, or a part thereof; to employ as special agents such of the supervisors of census as he may deem wise and proper, at the compensation provided for in section 17 of said act, the intent and purpose being that the supervisors of census may be appointed special agents at the time they are acting as supervisors, and receive the compensation to which they are entitled as supervisors, and also as special agents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to this paragraph recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "agents" in line 16, page 2, the following: "and the Director of the Census is authorized and directed to collect statistics relating to all of the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restrictions and limitations contained in section 8 of said act entitled, 'An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question pending before the committee is, Shall the amendment reported by the Committee on the Census, just read, be adopted? That is the amendment to the third section. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] asks recognition, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to move to strike out the word "two," in line 16, page 3, and insert the word "five," so that it will read "$5,000" instead of "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that that is an amendment which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to offer. The first matter in order is the question, Shall the amendment reported by the Committee, which has just been read, be adopted? That should first be disposed of, and then the gentleman's amendment would be in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman, on the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to interfere with the speedy taking and announcement of the results of the Twelfth Census, but I do wish to oppose certain amendments which have been proposed to the Senate bill now before this body. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], in his concluding remarks, urges haste upon this body, that the Director of the Census may be enabled to proceed speedily with the duty with which he has been charged, and to enable him to proceed speedily we are asked to allow him to take from the Public Printer a large share of his duty. Now, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me—

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that the amendment to which he refers is not now under consideration. His speech will properly come in a little later. I ask him to let us take a vote on this amendment first, and he can present his views when we reach the other matter.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I was informed that that was the amendment which was pending.

Mr. HOPKINS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] will be recognized later.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote on the committee amendment. The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], chairman of the committee, has notified the Chair that he desires to offer an amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] will be recognized later.

Mr. HOPKINS. In line 16, page 3, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five," so that it will read "five thousand" instead of "two thousand" dollars; and I desire to state to the members of the committee that this is not a committee amendment, but one which I offer in response to a suggestion made by the Director of the Census in a letter which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CENSUS OFFICE, OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1900.

DEAR MR. HOPKINS: I find, on consultation with the statisticians, that it will be necessary to amend line 8 on the third page of the proposed bill, to make it read "to not exceed the sum of $5,000," instead of $2,000. The books and periodicals necessary to be purchased for the proper carrying out of this act will certainly cost at least $5,000, so I suggest that you change the wording from $2,000 to $5,000 in line 8, page 3, of the proposed bill.

Truly, yours,

W. R. MERRIAM, Director.

Hon. A. J. HOPKINS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was reported by the Clerk, as follows:

On page 3, line 16, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" so that it will read: "not to exceed the sum of $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. I think it will be acceptable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut proposes an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "censuses," in line 21, page 2, the following:
 "And the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect statistics required by section 8 of said act, in regard to mines, mining, and minerals, at the time fixed for the enumeration of the population, agriculture, and manufactures, notwithstanding any restrictions for limitations contained in section 8 of said act."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment changes nothing in any respect except the time. Section 8 reads:

That after the completion and return of the enumeration of the work in the schedules relating to products of agriculture and to manufacturing and mechanical establishments—

After that work is all done, which must be done in 1903, then this work is to be taken up, and it will not be possible to do this work and make the report in 1903 if this part of the work is delayed until after that is done. It changes it in no other respect that I know of. It is a matter of form, and it will aid the Geological Survey, which cooperates with this work.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have consulted with the members of the committee, and I think there is no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to line 16, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend line 16, page 2, by inserting the word "not" before the word "also;" so that it will read: "And not also as special agents."

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know whether it is intended by this bill, as it seems to me it is intended, to pay these supervisors not only a thousand dollars for about two or three months' work, but to allow the same supervisor to act as a special agent, to be paid for that and to be paid traveling expenses, and then to be paid $3 a day for subsistence. If that is the meaning of this bill, it seems to me that it is making a great deal more liberal provision for supervisors of the census than is made for the pay of members of this House.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] can answer that.

Mr. LENTZ. I should like to have the question answered before I make any remarks, and I yield to the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Has the gentleman completed his statement?

Mr. LENTZ. I say I yield for an answer as to whether that is the meaning of this bill, and if so, why?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I can tell the gentleman why it is so. It is for this reason, and this only: In certain districts, of which my own, the Third district of Wisconsin, is an example, it is almost an entirely agricultural district, and there is but very little work for a special agent in the way of gathering statistics—so little that it would be practically impossible to get a special agent there.

I was present in the office of the Director of the Census when he said to the supervisor having charge of that district, "After your work is done I would like to have you do this special work, if you will, as there is not enough of it to send a man there for the purpose." That is the reason, and, I understand, the only reason, why these supervisors can be employed in those districts where there is but little work after their duties as supervisors are completed. They are not to draw double pay.

Mr. LENTZ. Is it not a fact that the supervisor is provided with clerks during the progress of the two or three months' work in taking the census?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; I do not understand that there are any districts where clerks are allowed, or only a few.

Mr. LENTZ. Am I to understand that this special work is not to be performed during the progress of taking enumeration?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not until after that is completed.

Mr. HULL. Then it is really a matter of economy?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is a matter of economy to the Government of the United States, and because of the difficulty of securing suitable men for this special purpose.

Mr. LENTZ. Well, if it is meant that these men are not to draw double pay, or pay in two capacities at the same time, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in saying this work by special agents is separate and distinct from the work of a supervisor or enumerator, and that it is to come afterwards.

Mr. LENTZ. May I ask what work will be required after the census is taken and the enumeration reports are made to the supervisor?

Mr. HOPKINS. They have to have special agents to take the manufacturing and mechanical statistics, which are not contemplated in the instructions sent out to the enumerators. It has been found that they have to have a different class of men, frequently of higher talents and larger experience, for this special work than for taking the enumeration of the people.

Mr. LENTZ. Does that mean that the special agent will travel over the same district and get the statistics?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. LENTZ (continuing). To obtain the facts in reference to manufactures?

Mr. HOPKINS. In a purely agricultural county they do not require any special agent, but there may be a city of 10,000, 20,000, 30,000, or 40,000 in a county where the enumerator will only take the population, and a special agent will go to the manufacturing institutions and learn all in regard to the facts that it is proposed to be gathered in respect to them. Their separate report comes to a separate division of the Census Bureau, over which presides a statistician, and the facts will be bound in a separate volume when the reports are published.

Mr. LENTZ. That will come in later.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman explain the language under which they may appoint special agents at the time they are acting as supervisors?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; it may be done.

Mr. HULL. They may be appointed while acting as supervisors?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. LENTZ. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me while I read line 10, page 2, which says:

To employ as special agents such of the supervisors of census as he may deem wise and proper, at the compensation provided for in section 17 of said act, the intent and purpose being that the supervisors of census may be appointed special agents at the time they are acting as supervisors, and receive the compensation to which they are entitled as supervisors and also as special agents.

Now, if that does not give them double pay, why—

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. Let me explain to the gentleman. Under existing law the supervisors are not clothed with the authority, nor is the responsibility imposed upon them, to gather statistics relating to manufactures, etc. That legislation contemplates a separate officer for that.

The Director of the Census has discovered, as in the case of my friend from Wisconsin, that it would be impossible to select different men for that, because of reasons that exist in the districts, and in those cases that duty will be imposed upon the supervisor of the census; but inasmuch as it is work that was not contemplated in the legislation when he was appointed, it is proposed to pay him, if he does the work, the same compensation that would be paid to a third party, in case the third party could be secured who is competent for the work.

Mr. LENTZ. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that it has been intimated to me by one who is to be a supervisor that they expected legislation which will give them more than $1,000 for this work, and it seems to me that this very language carries to the supervisor additional pay, because you have put into this section the words—

At the time they are acting as supervisors, and receive the compensation to which they are entitled as supervisors, and also as special agents.

Why not make that plain? Why not strike that out? If the gentleman's explanation is correct, then my word "not" belongs here, and I do not want to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the supervisor does the work, he ought to be paid the same as any other person.

Mr. LENTZ. What work does he do for the thousand dollars? His clerks will do substantially all the work. It is enough to donate a thousand dollars to a supervisor.

Mr. HOPKINS. The enumerators that are appointed by the supervisor will report to the supervisor every day as well as to the Director, and it is the duty, under the law, of the supervisor to take these reports and tabulate them and verify them and send them on to the Director of the Census. That is the work he does, in addition to laying out his district and appointing the enumerators. That is what he gets the $1,000 compensation for.

Mr. LENTZ. Is it not intended that that shall all be done in two months?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; the supervisors were appointed months ago. They are working now and have been for two or three months.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me, I attempted to state what I have known of the practical working of the office. It is intended by the Director to appoint special agents, where there is sufficient work to employ them for any reasonable length of time. In my district a man will do it in ten days. The arrangement made by the supervisor in that district is that after he has completed his enumeration he will do the special work and be paid by the day.

Mr. LENTZ. Granting all that, is not this true that the supervisor has 100 enumerators reporting to him, and that he has work enough to take up all of his time as a supervisor? Why can not he employ some one else to do the ten days' work? There are plenty of competent men in the community to do it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the gentleman's amendment would add expense instead of economy. The idea of the Director is that in these districts where there is so little to do it would be economy for the Government to permit the supervisor to do it.

Mr. LENTZ. But why not employ local special agents to do it? Why can not a man in Milwaukee or Chicago—

Mr. BABCOCK. It is not intended to apply to large places. They have special agents in those large places. It is only in districts where there is very little work to do that the supervisor is to be employed.

Mr. LENTZ. I do not see why we should give him double pay.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. LENTZ; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENTZ) there were 87 ayes and 101 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, at the beginning of the paragraph, insert the word "however."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk (reading the bill) read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the other statistics required to be collected by section 7 of said act approved March 3, 1899, there shall be collected on the agricultural schedules information concerning the number and kinds of live stock not on farms; and the Director of the Census shall have power to pay the enumerators for collecting such information, in his discretion, not less than 5 nor more than 10 cents for each barn or inclosure visited in which such live stock may be found: Provided, however, That the Director of the Census may appoint special agents to gather the information required by this section whenever he may deem it proper.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 3, after the word "proper," insert the words "which agents shall be apportioned equitably between the Territories as well as the States."

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, in offering that amendment I assume that there is general legislation providing that in all appointments made they should be equitably distributed between the States and the Territories. I represent more people and a larger area than any other gentleman on this floor. Most members have been apportioned six places in the Census Office in their district— [Cries of "Oh, no, no, no."] That is all right—you have not got them all in office yet—but six have been allotted in many cases.

A MEMBER. Only four.

Mr. FLYNN. Some gentleman states that they only got four. I am willing to accept that statement. But why, if they have only had four, should I be curtailed to two? I have not mine in yet, although, as a matter of fact, I was authorized to appoint two in my district. I am not finding fault with the Director of the Census about that; in fact, I have no fault to find with him except this, that he does not seem to realize that in our section we have a country expanding, a population increasing, and that we would like the same representation in the Census Office there as is accorded other Representatives on the floor of this House.

When I say that gentlemen have been accredited with four, I realize that they are not all in office yet. I am not talking about those who can not pass the examination. What I do ask is that this apportionment, which it appears to be taken for granted we are entitled to, be equally divided. I want my share. [Laughter.] I desire to have it understood that I have patriots enough in my district who are willing to draw the emoluments and swear to support the Constitution, so that I want them to have a chance.

Mr. BABCOCK. Are there more than two of the gentleman's constituents who will pass the examination necessary?

Mr. FLYNN. Why, we have in Oklahoma 400,000 people, and I warrant the statement that there is no Representative on this floor who has as intelligent a constituency. [Applause and laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, 98 per cent of them are native-born American citizens. [Applause.] Their enlightenment and a desire to go forward and help build up this great country induced them to come to Oklahoma and leave the drones behind them. [Laughter.] I believe that the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. HOPKINS] will accede to the proposition that in this apportionment the Territories should have also, in proportion to their population, their proportionate share.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is no law on this subject, and the gentleman, according to his own statement, has succeeded better than I have, and better than many other members have, and I think we had better vote the amendment down.

Mr. FLYNN. One moment, Mr. Chairman, we are making law now, and that is the reason I offer this amendment.

Mr. LENTZ. I should like to know, and I was going to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN], whether it would be possible to get one Democratic enumerator in any Northern State under his provision?

Mr. FLYNN. If I had my way there would not be a Democratic enumerator in any State under a Republican Administration. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LENTZ. In other words, you want a Republican census and Republican census enumerators for the next campaign.

Mr. FLYNN. I want a competent census, and that is why I insist on Republican enumerators. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, because I believe it but fair to his people, notwithstanding the partisan sentiment that the gentleman has just now expressed. I see the gentleman even scowls at the idea that I should support his amendment. [Laughter.] It is possible that he may suffer the same fate that I and others in my State have. He says now boldly that he would not allow any Democrat anywhere in the United States to have anything to do with the taking of the census. I want to say to him and those on that side that you talked in a very different tone when you were first passing this law. You put into the law a provision that these appointments should be made fairly upon merit and not from any partisan reasons or bias.

Mr. SHATTUC. That is what they are doing.

Mr. RIDGELY. Not in my State. I want to say here that in the State of Kansas this partisan policy that the gentleman [Mr. FLYNN] has just indorsed has been absolutely applied, and no Democrat or Populist gets any position on the entire field force in the State of Kansas, not even one supervisor, although in many other States you have conformed to the spirit of the law. Out in Kansas the policy and idea is that we are not entitled to anything. I say to you if you can afford to practice such partisan selfishness, go on and you will make votes for us. We have Republicans out there who believe in fair dealing and who believe that the sentiment and spirit of this census law should be complied with there as well as in other States. I will say, in justice to the Director, that this matter has been carried over his head to the President, and the President has taken the partisan stand and has insisted that every appointee in Kansas shall be a Republican, and that has been done. The Director has kindly allowed us two clerks in his force.

Now, gentlemen, I say support the amendment and vote for it, because it is in the direction of fair dealing for the good people of his Territory, and we ought to support fair dealing whenever we have an opportunity. The gentleman is right in offering the amendment, and I hope his Republican friends will stand by him in behalf of the people of Oklahoma, even if you do abuse and ignore half the good people of my State.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask that the amendment be again read. There was so much confusion that we could not hear it.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. FLYNN. I merely desire to state, with reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY], that he is a very genial gentleman, and I am an admirer of his in everything except his politics; but my statement that I would not appoint a Democratic enumerator is based upon the fact that in my Territory we had four years of national Democratic rule, and we were unable to secure the appointment of resident Democrats scarcely in the entire Territory of Oklahoma to hold many offices that of right belonged to us.

Under the census management, though we have not had many places, they have been given to those who resided in the Territory. Consequently I offered this amendment in good faith, and I am confident that it would have passed if I had not received the support of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY] under the circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. It may not hurt you as much as you think, after all. Though your own words here do not entitle you to the support of the House, yet I hope your people may not suffer on account of your personal discourtesies to me.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FLYNN) there were—ayes 18, noes 97.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the event of the death of any supervisor or enumerator after his appointment and entrance on his duties, the Director of the Census be, and he is, authorized to pay to his widow or legal representative such sum as may be just and fair for the services rendered by said supervisor or enumerator prior to his death.

With the following amendment proposed by the committee:

In line 7, after the word "widow," strike out the word "or" and insert "if there be one, and if not, to his."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remaining committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting as section 4 the following:

"SEC. 4. That the Director of the Census, whenever he shall find that there is a probability of delay in the printing or publishing of the census reports beyond the period required by the said act of March 3, 1890, be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to contract with any individual, copartnership, or corporation for the printing and binding, or either, of any of said reports, in the manner prescribed by law for the letting of public contracts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to strike out the committee amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following, which is the amendment of my friend the gentleman from Georgia, slightly modified.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that is my amendment with a slight change?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] moves the following substitute for the committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of section 4 as proposed insert:

"SEC. 4. The Public Printer shall establish in the Public Printing Office a division or branch printing office, which shall be under the direction and control of the Public Printer, of sufficient capacity to meet the demands of the act approved March 3, 1890, entitled 'An act relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.'"

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think that meets the requirements of both sides and that it will satisfy gentlemen who have been opposed to section 4. I trust we can take a vote on it without any debate.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. LENTZ. Are we to understand that this branch printing office is to be put into some other building, away from the Government Printing Office?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; it is just to create a division.

Mr. LENTZ. What object is there, then, in calling it a branch office?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has the floor.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to make a speech I will yield to him.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Just for a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. I did not propose to speak against the amendment which he has now offered, but to speak in its favor. I was opposed to the committee amendment known as section 4, whereby it was proposed to take this work out of the hands of the Public Printer, thereby doing away with the old-time custom of giving all such work to the proper officer. Now that his importance has been recognized and this work has been placed in his hands, where it properly belongs, I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will pardon the Chair. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire recognition?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will be recognized later.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I only have a word to say. Except for the great regard I have for the ability and good nature of my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Census, I should say, almost, this proposition was a ridiculous one. It proposes that the Government Printer shall establish in the Printing Office—in his own office—a branch establishment.

I do not understand the object of it. Shall he draw a division between all the branches and all the processes of the Government printing and say all on that side of the line is a branch of the Census Office and all on the other side is another office for general Government work? I do not think it needs comment to show to the members of this House that this division would be impracticable and almost ridiculous. I am decidedly against any amendment. You can not reach this question except in one way. You can not reach it except by voting up or voting down the section proposed by this bill. [Loud applause.] And on that I am ready to stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is next entitled to recognition.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it seems to me that if we have done any good here at all that we have finished our work when we write the word "death" at the end of the third section. This bill will be better without the fourth section, and it will be better without the proposed amendment of either gentleman. There is no necessity for all this verbiage which is proposed to be tacked on here. The Government has a printing office. That establishment is so well administered that everybody has devoted time in complimenting our Government.

Why all this talk? You may just as well draw chalk lines in certain parts of the floor of the Printing Office and say that part shall be set aside for the Public Printer and that the other side shall be set apart for the Director of the Census for a branch printing office. If the Director of the Census will get the material ready and deliver it to the Public Printer the work can be done, and will be done, and it seems to me it will be done cheaper than if it were done at a branch office.

If there is anything intended by a branch office at the Census Bureau, it is that there shall be more branch officers to hold more places, or it means nothing; and if we are to amend at all let us be honest and say we mean to create a few more places for persons seeking a chance at the public Treasury. It seems to me that in the discussion this afternoon it has been well demonstrated not only by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], but also by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL] that there is no necessity to waste any further time, and that there is no possibility of gentlemen here making any provision or any amendment of this law which would be worth one penny to the Government or to the census.

Let us close with the word at the end of the third section, vote down the amendment proposed, and vote down the fourth section; and when we shall have done that, it seems to me we shall have done all we can do and ought to do on this subject to-day.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have corrected the amendment I sent up so as to meet the views of gentlemen on both sides, and I desire to have that amendment read as I desire to see it pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The Public Printer shall establish a division or branch printing office, which shall be under the direction and control of the Public Printer, of sufficient capacity to meet the demands of the act approved March 3, 1890, entitled "An act relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses."

Mr. HOPKINS. And now I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, just a word, because I do not desire to delay the vote, that this places the responsibility on the Public Printer precisely as the law of the Fifty-fifth Congress places it on the Director of the Census to get his work out, and it leaves it with the Public Printer to say that if he can do it all in the building where he now is, it can be so done; but if necessary to establish a branch at the Census Office, it can be done there. Without taking any further time, I ask for a vote on the amendment. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, in my opinion, it is good for the House and good for the country that we have had this discussion. It is a vindication of the Public Printing Office and has shown to members of the House that it is what many of us have known it to be for years—one of the best equipped and best managed in the country. The present incumbent of that office is one of the most courteous and capable men holding office under this Administration. Under all Administrations the public printing has been done satisfactorily; it has been done well. He tells the House he can do the census work, and we believe him. Now, shall we reflect upon this officer by inserting in this bill a paragraph which implies that he has not heretofore done or does not in the future intend to do his duty? He can print the messages of the President and the reports of the various Departments, and can not be trusted to print for the Census Department! I join with the gentleman from Connecticut in saying that I believe the whole of this paragraph ought to go out and the substitute be voted down.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. We are making no reflection in this amendment upon the Public Printer.

Mr. McRAE. It requires him to establish a branch or division for the Census Office.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. It does not require him; it gives him power to do it.

Mr. McRAE. If you are to believe him—

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. It enlarges his power.

Mr. McRAE. If you are to believe him, he can do this work without such division just as well as he can do the other work he is called upon to do, if you will give him the space and printers.

Gentlemen complain that they have not been able to get the Nineteenth Geological Report; but I tell gentlemen that I have at least one copy, the twentieth volume of that report, printed and bound, with all the plates necessary to illustrate the work. There may be some delay in some of them, because he has not enough force at times. But we have made an appropriation to construct a new building, now being built, and when that work shall have been done he will have sufficient accommodations for all the compositors necessary to do all of the printing for the Government.

I hope that the Director of the Census, capable as I hope and believe he is, will learn something from the experience of the delays of the last census and this discussion, and that we shall not have this delay in the furnishing of material to the Printer. This discussion has shown that almost all of the fault and delay was in the Census Bureau and not in the Printing Office. If this Bureau will prepare the manuscript, I believe I should be safe in guaranteeing that the Public Printer would give to the public the reports promptly and in better shape than they can be furnished by any other individual or corporation.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask one question. The evidence before this House is to the effect that the Public Printing Office, as now constituted, is abundantly able to do all of this work. I want to ask this question: Why establish in addition a branch office? [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. The answer to that is this: That it does not require him to use any different men or machinery than he has now, but it directs him to set apart sufficient of those to meet the requirements of the law, precisely as the Director of the Census is required to do it under existing law.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask a similar question to that propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I regard this as an ill-considered proposition and one that we ought not to introduce. It is meaningless in effect and seems to me to be nothing more than hasty legislation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say but a single word, because I did not get an opportunity to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] a question on his explanation of the effect of the pending substitute if adopted. If I catch its meaning, as read from the Clerk's desk, it does not sustain the explanation made by the gentleman from Illinois. Let us see. It provides that the Public Printer shall establish "a branch or division" in his office, and that branch shall be sufficient in equipment and force to do all the census work. Now, that branch of the division, the new establishment—I say establishment, for what does the word "establish" mean?—would remain at least comparatively permanent. After Congress adjourns there must be a shrinkage of the force in the Public Printer's employ, and it would occur in the old establishment and not in the new under this substitute. And it would be true under the language of that amendment, if I can construe it rightly, that a Public Printer's force would go on in the census branch, and then, when a less force was needed, the shrinkage would occur on the old force. The point is that the old force would suffer and the new would continue unmolested.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to say this—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I desire to proceed. Mr. Chairman, I did not in the beginning intend to say anything on this proposition. I intended to vote for the bill as the committee brought it in. We have known in years past that the people of the United States have not received the benefit of the census work as performed by the officers of the Government. Why? Because ten years have rolled by after once you have completed the taking of the census before you gave it to the people for their inspection. By the time the printing of the books was completed in the usual old way, and they were laid before the people, your work in many respects was no longer valuable. It is valueless for the purposes for which it was printed. For that reason I say it is the duty of this Congress, if it is impossible at any time for the Public Printer, in the usual course of business and with the facilities at his hand, to complete these volumes within the time that they can be furnished to the people, so they can receive the full benefit from the statistics gathered, then it is our duty to allow the Director of the Census to go out on the open market and contract for the printing of these volumes at the least price and furnish them to the people of the United States.

If that can not be done under the bill as it stands to-day, if it can not be done under the law as it stands to-day, it can not be done under any amendment such as is now offered. I consider the proposition an absolute absurdity. Under the laws of the census, and under all the censuses heretofore, the Public Printer has been allowed to enlarge his force without any special legislation; if the Appropriations Committee allow the money, he can put on men and establish the necessary force to print these documents whether you provide for a special power or not. I say that when we attempt to dodge the question we are not doing justice to our constituents, to the people who are entitled to this information. We ought to vote down this proposition to establish a branch printing office. You accomplish nothing by adopting this proposed amendment, because the Public Printer can accomplish it all now under the law as it now stands.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if this has been referred to the Public Printer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposition seems to have been brought before this House without any consideration by anyone. There is no estimate brought in here to show whether the Public Printer can do the work better under this law than under the law that now exists. There is no information that it has been inquired into by the Director of the Census. The only thing I can see is that possibly some of the gentlemen on this floor who were in favor of the fourth section have now become alarmed and wish to run away from a vote. I say if we are in favor of the fourth section and want to assist the Director of the Census in sending out volumes, let us face the question honestly and squarely. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I sent to the Clerk's desk was in the interest of harmony. If there is objection, I wish to withdraw it and take a vote on the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is withdrawn by the gentleman from Illinois, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Census.

The amendment was rejected without a division.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CANNON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the same do pass.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move the previous question on the amendments and on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments?

Mr. McRAE. I ask that the amendments be again reported.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, they have just been read.

Mr. McRAE. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, they will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this is a bill that ought to be ingrafted into law at once, I ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreement between the two Houses, and that the Speaker appoint the House conferees, this being a Senate bill with House amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that a conference be asked with the Senate, and that the Speaker appoint the conferees on the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. GRIFFITH.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DE GRAFFENREID for five days, on account of death in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the Missouri River at Napoleon, Mo.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the investigation relating to the relief of the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of communications from the officer in charge of the overland relief expedition and a report of the adjustment of the accounts of the Cape Smythe Whaling and Trading Company—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service submitting an estimate for equipment of new building at the marine hospital at Chicago, Ill.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Acting Commissary-General of Subsistence relating to legislation affecting officers who disburse subsistence funds—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 77) to provide for pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 73); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2905) to complete the establishment and erection of a military post near the city of Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming, and making an appropriation therefor, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 74); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PEARRE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6777) relative to the widening and extension of Sixteenth street, in the District of Columbia, reported the same, accompanied by a report (No. 75); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1192) for the relief of Charles Gallagher, of New York, and to refer his claims to the Court of Claims—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 3434) for the relief of the New England Distilling Company, of Covington, Ky.—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1900.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator and Railway Company for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1899; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDAATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th instant, a list of all judgments for Indian depredation claims that have been rendered by the Court of Claims and are not included in his last report.

The Chair is uncertain whether the communication should go to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest that the report of the Attorney-General be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was the object of the resolution to obtain information for the use of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the distribution of the appropriation bills the Indian appropriation bill goes to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well. Let it be referred to that committee, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will, without objection, be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: An order was made directing the information conveyed by the Attorney-General touching Indian depredation judgments to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Chair is informed that the appropriation is contained in the deficiency appropriation bill, and therefore the papers should be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, rather than go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. The item making appropriations for judgments in regard to Indian depredations is in the deficiency appropriation bill as it came from the House, and it is pending before the Committee on Appropriations. I was not aware the matter had been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference will be changed, and the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, if there be no objection.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2560) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Charles Mulherron; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2561) granting an increase of pension to John B. Goman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2562) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Wolfley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 2563) to correct the military record of Decatur Dakin (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2564) to correct the military record of Henry Beason;

A bill (S. 2565) to correct the military record of Shannon S. Bailey (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2566) to correct the military record of Isaac Holdbrook (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 2567) to authorize the Arizona Water Company to erect water-power plants on its canals across the reservation set apart for the Pima and Maricopa Indians by Executive order dated June 14, 1879, in the county of Maricopa, Territory of Arizona; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McLAURIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2568) for the relief of Ellen Mary Anderson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2569) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Webb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2570) granting an increase of pension to John M. Swift; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2571) to provide rules and regulations governing the importation of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, cuttings, grafts, and buds, commonly known as nursery stock, and fruits into the United States, and rules and regulations for the inspection of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, grafts, cuttings, and buds, commonly known as nursery stock, grown within the United States, which become subjects of interstate commerce or exportation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2572) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.," approved February 21, 1899; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2573) for the relief of Carolina Carter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2574) for the relief of Haliday & Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2575) for the relief of William Wolfe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 2576) for the relief of William H. H. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FRACTIONAL SILVER COINS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to make to the Senate a report of the amount of fractional silver coins coined monthly from January 1, 1899, to December 31, 1899, and what amount of such coinage was manufactured from old silver coins melted, and what amount, if any, was made from new bullion, and from whom such new bullion was purchased, and the price paid therefor per ounce, and the amount of the seigniorage thereon.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims requiring an appropriation for their payment and not included in his last report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2284) extending the time for the completion of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by an act approved June 3, 1896.

The message also announced that the House had passed, with amendments, the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. GRIFFITH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVE OF THE TRANSVAAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read. The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate if any person has been accredited representative in any capacity to the United States of America by the South African Republic, commonly known as the Transvaal, and if such person was officially accepted and recognized as such representative by the Government of the United States, and if he was not, for what reason official acceptance and recognition were refused him; and the Secretary of State is further directed to inform the Senate of the name of such person, and when he applied for official recognition, and when and for what reason official recognition was refused him, and if any other government, and, if so, what government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative of said South African or Transvaal Republic by the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out, in line 1, the words "Secretary of State" and inserting "President;" in line 2, by striking out "directed" and inserting "requested;" in the same line, after "Senate," inserting "if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest;" and in line 8, by striking out "and the Secretary of State is further directed" and inserting "also."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which will be read.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to know, if the Senator from Wisconsin has no objection to stating it, the purpose of that amendment? What is the reason why he offers it?

Mr. HOAR. The question has not been entirely put from the Chair. Let the Secretary read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as proposed to be amended on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, if any person has been accredited representative in any capacity to the United States of America by the South African Republic, commonly known as the Transvaal, and if such person was officially accepted and recognized as such representative by the Government of the United States, and if he was not, for what reason official acceptance and recognition were refused him; also to inform the Senate of the name of such person, and when he applied for official recognition, and when and for what reason official recognition was refused him, and if any other Government, and if so, what Government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative of said South African or Transvaal Republic by the Government of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin ought to state why he desires to have this amendment made before the Senate is called upon to vote on the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I am perfectly willing to do so, if the Senator desires it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin. Mr. SPOONER. I think, Mr. President, we ought to have some rule, and be governed by some rule or principle, as to the form of this and similar resolutions. So far as I have known during my short experience in the Senate, and also so far as I have ever had opportunity to consult the precedents, my recollection is that it has been the uniform practice of the Senate, where it sought any information bearing upon our foreign relations, to address a request to the President, with the qualification which I have suggested in the amendment, to furnish it, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest.

It is not a mere matter of etiquette, in my judgment, either, but if it were a mere matter of etiquette, dealing with a coordinate and independent branch of the Government, we certainly ought to employ that formula which is most in harmony with politeness. But in my view, and I think it is perfectly clear, we have no right to demand information of the President as to the status or conduct of our foreign relations. If that be true, the form of the resolution as introduced by my friend from Nebraska is objectionable, because where we can not command or demand we ought not to assume to direct.

I never have heard it denied, until recently, although it is asserted by Justice Story, by Pomeroy, and stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in many decisions, and by other judicial tribunals, that the organ of communication between this Government and foreign governments is, under the Constitution, the executive department. It is not Congress; it is not the judiciary; it is not one branch of Congress; it is the President. In practice it must be so, Mr. President. The Secretary of State, so far as his function concerns the foreign relations of the United States, has been understood and has been treated by Congress as upon a different basis or footing from the other Cabinet officials. That was the theory upon which that Department was created.

The President need not employ the hand or the brain of the Secretary of State in the conduct of our foreign relations. He may not utilize him unless he chooses in the negotiation of treaties. He need not utilize him unless he chooses in the conduct of our foreign correspondence. He may do it all in person if he sees fit, and when the Secretary of State does it he does it for the President. He does not perform any duty, so far as our foreign relations are concerned, under compulsion of any act of Congress. He carries forward no correspondence with foreign governments by command of any act of Congress, because by the Constitution that entire function is vested in the President.

I invite the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the language—

Mr. ALLEN. I am not ignorant of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I will invite the attention of those who perhaps may be ignorant of it—outside, of course, this Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I call attention to the language of the section which imposes duties upon the Secretary of State. It is the old act of 1789, which has never been changed in that respect, and it is entirely in harmony with the theory for which I contend:

SEC. 32. The Secretary of State shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to correspondences, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to the Department, and he shall conduct the business of the Department in such manner as the President shall direct.

I do not deny that he may not be called upon to discharge duties which are imposed by Congress, and possibly as to those duties we may direct him in a call for information, but I do deny that as to foreign relations he can be directed properly by the Senate.

We have no right to demand of the President—and I presume my friend from Nebraska will admit it—copies of correspondence as to current negotiations, and, I think, any negotiations between this Government and foreign governments. We have a right to request it; and we must assume that if the President is of the opinion that its transmission to Congress will be in harmony with the public interest, he will transmit it. But he knows more, and inevitably must know more, about the complications, the delicate phases, of foreign relations than we can know, because he is to conduct them.

I utterly repudiate the idea, Mr. President, which has been uttered here in this Chamber many times within the last two weeks, that the people of the United States are entitled to know from day to day everything connected with the administration of the Government. It would not be contended that while the President is conducting a war under his power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the people are to be advised from day to day of the military plans, nor would it be expected that the people are to be advised from day to day of the correspondence, negotiations, pending with foreign governments, every one of which is a competitor of ours in many ways, certainly in commercial ways. Diplomacy must be secret in order to be successful.

I think the people of the United States are willing to trust the President, whoever he may be—I speak not simply of the distinguished gentleman who to-day is President, but any President—relying upon his patriotism and upon his discretion. The people know that the business of this Government can not be properly conducted if from day to day either House of Congress has a right to demand that there shall be laid before the country every detail and that nothing is to be regarded as confidential.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator. The Senator, I dare say, knows that I entirely agree with him in the view which he has just expressed. I expressed it very earnestly within a day or two in the Senate when the resolution of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was up. I do not ask it with a view of antagonizing his position, but as he is making a statement on this subject, I will ask him if he will express his opinion as to where we get the authority to direct the heads of the other Departments of the Government besides the Secretary of State, so that his statement may be complete.

Mr. SPOONER. The other Departments of the Government ordinarily are engaged in executing laws which we pass and in performing duties which we, by law, impose upon them. I admitted a moment ago that as to the Secretary of State we may pass laws imposing duties, and we may probably direct him to inform the Senate as to the performance of duties imposed upon him by act of Congress. I have attempted to draw the distinction, and I think it is a perfectly valid one, between the Secretary of State in his relation to the discharge of duties imposed by statute and the Secretary of State in his relation to the conduct of foreign relations, as to which he is not the servant of Congress; he is simply the servant of the President.

This contention upon my part I think my friend from Nebraska will see is not at all a partisan one. I would take the same position no matter who might be President of the United States. I submit to Senators it is as easy to recognize the status and position of the President under the Constitution in relation to the conduct of our foreign affairs as it is to violate it. I submit to Senators that we ought to adopt the rule—I do not mean a written rule, but to be governed by the tradition and the precedent, which is not only in itself a proper and polite thing, but is of value to the country—that in calling for information relating to our foreign affairs we should address a request to the President with the qualification which I have suggested.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to one point, if I may have leave of the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. In regard to the Secretary of the Treasury, the original act, I think, contains this provision which is now the law in the Revised Statutes:

The Secretary of the Treasury * * * shall make report, and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, as may be required.

Now, no such provision was made when the Department of State was established at the same time, though they were contemporary acts, showing that the original organizers of the Government took the view which the Senator states as to the distinction between the State Department and the Treasury Department. I believe in forming and in establishing the other Departments that provision has not always been enacted about them. I can not have time to look now.

Mr. ALLISON. No; the other Departments report to the President.

Mr. HOAR. We have always considered that the principle applicable to the Treasury Department was applicable to the other Departments and have always undertaken to direct them to give us information in their Departments as we saw fit, and so has the House of Representatives; but so far as I am aware that never has been done with regard to the Secretary of State.

Mr. SPOONER. Never.

Mr. HOAR. If at all, very seldom.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. We have a right to call on the head of a Department for information as respects our current legislation where it is a matter over which we have jurisdiction.

Mr. SPOONER. Or as to the discharge of duties imposed by act of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Or imposed by acts of Congress. That has always been the rule. But the Secretary of the Treasury is required to report directly to Congress under the statute of 1789.

Mr. HOAR. Either in person or by writing.

Mr. ALLISON. So his report always comes addressed to Congress, and all the other Departments report to the President.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true, as suggested by the two Senators; and from the organization of the State Department until to-day, so far as I have been able to find, there is no act of Congress requiring a report, and never has been any report from the Secretary of State to Congress as to foreign affairs.

Now, I think this resolution ought to be amended in accordance with this suggestion, and I hope my friend from Nebraska will not object to it. If there is any good reason why the President should not transmit the information, he will say so. The information can not be given to the people of the United States alone. That is one trouble with such matters. The President can not give information to the Senate in its executive session even with absolute certainty that its confidential character will be preserved. He can not give it to the people of the United States without giving it to the world, and my friend will concede that it might be very harmful many, many times to give it to the world.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, nothing would delight me more than to be able to agree entirely with my friend from Wisconsin if I could do so conscientiously. I can agree with him, and do agree with him, that all resolutions addressed to the President of the United States or to any Department of the Government should be couched in respectful language, and I had supposed, until he reminded me to the contrary, that my resolution was couched in the ordinary form of a resolution for information addressed to a Department. That is all I seek. I heard the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] contend a day or two ago, and it seemed to be universally acquiesced in, especially by my friend the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who is a stickler for that form, that all resolutions addressed to a Department should be directed instead of requested.

No man has a higher regard for the President of the United States, the present incumbent of that great office, than I have. The world knows that I disagree with him in his political views. He is not a believer in any policy or measure that I know of to which I agree; and yet he is the President of the United States and an eminent gentleman, and to his office and to his personality I owe, as every other citizen owes, a due amount of respect, and I cheerfully accord it to him and to the office. But, Mr. President, I am not required to subordinate my views of the proprieties and amenities and decencies of life to the wishes or caprice of some other gentleman. I could not get along in this world very well if I did that, because I would be constantly running against gentlemen who disagree with me, as I am doing daily. I must be guided, Mr. President, by my sense of right and of propriety and of order, as I have been and shall be in the future.

Now, I do not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, I regret to say again, upon the proposition that the Secretary of State can not be reached in this way. I am perfectly willing to accord full credit to the great opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the decisions of Mr. Justice Story. I do not know so much about Mr. Pomeroy. I do not know that I would be willing to give his opinion as much credit as that of the others referred to. But, Mr. President, there are certain things in connection with the construction of the Constitution of the United States of which no one man, past or present, has a monopoly. I care not who he may be. The history of the Constitution of the United States can be found within about ten or twelve volumes; it is not voluminous. It is not difficult to be understood by a person who sees fit to give it some attention. I utterly repudiate the idea sometimes brought out in our discussions that some one man by virtue of his location or his nationality or some other cause has a monopoly of all the wisdom that pertains to the construction of the Constitution and of our political institutions. I say this with no reference whatever to my friend from Wisconsin, whom I recognize as an able exponent of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, I recognize that it would be impolitic for the President of the United States to disclose any uncompleted diplomatic negotiations, for to disclose them might be the very means of thwarting their accomplishment. But when diplomatic negotiations have ended and have passed into history and are completed, there is no word in the Constitution and no deduction to be drawn from it that the President of the United States is the exclusive custodian of that record or of what it contains.

In so far as the Secretary of State is the clerk or the assistant or the means by which the President of the United States carries on his diplomatic correspondence and negotiations, I recognize him as exercising executive as distinguished from administrative power. Therefore I recognize his privilege in this resolution. But the distinction between executive power and administrative power is as clear and as well marked as the distinction between daylight and darkness. The one is the constitutional power, involving discretion in the officer; the other is a mere statutory power and denies all discretion to the officer exercising it. The line of demarcation is plain and distinct in the duties of the Secretary of State. In so far as he carries on the negotiations of the Government as the agent of the President of the United States, the Chief Executive, his correspondence and his negotiations are free from intrenchment by us; but in so far as he is an administrative officer and is made the custodian of completed records that have passed into history, he is an administrative officer, and his protection as the agent of the President of the United States ceases.

If this were not true, Mr. President, there are no conceivable circumstances under which Congress could obtain valuable information necessary for our legislation and for our deliberations. Suppose the President of the United States were at variance with Congress; suppose we were to repeat the scenes of thirty-five years ago in this Chamber, and suppose the President or his Secretary of State was the custodian of valuable information necessary for Congress to declare war or to do something else that it alone has power to do, would the honorable Senator from Wisconsin say that under those circumstances the President or his Secretary of State could absolutely, without excuse, refuse us that information?

Mr. President, all this contention grows out of the doctrine sometimes discussed in this Chamber that the power of the President to carry on diplomatic negotiations and to recognize foreign countries is an exclusive power. I deny that. It is not the true interpretation of the Constitution. Suppose Congress says it will not recognize the existence of some foreign country. Suppose it declines in the most emphatic terms to do so, does the Senator from Wisconsin claim that the President of the United States, notwithstanding our declination, can do that? Can the Government be bound by it and by all the consequences to flow from it?

Mr. President, that is not the true doctrine. The sovereign power of this nation rests in three great coordinate departments, all of which have certain assigned duties and all of which must act in harmony to be productive of its full sovereignty, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of the Government.

This resolution does not call for incomplete information respecting an incomplete negotiation. The Secretary of State is the custodian of the records to which we must have access for this information. If the event has passed into history and is concluded, is it not proper that Congress, the lawmaking power of this Government, and the power that exercises quasi judicial and executive functions, should have some information respecting this matter? Can the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State for him, recognize or decline to recognize governments at his caprice or his will without power in some branch of this Government to bring out the information and see whether that power has been exercised wisely or not?

While the President of the United States and his Secretary of State, acting as his agent or his clerk, have certain well-defined powers that we can not interfere with at all times, and which we should not desire to interfere with, yet ultimately, when the exercise of these powers has been completed in any particular instance, when the event has passed into history and it is necessary for Congress to have information to intelligently discharge its duties, we have the power to call for that information. It may be that the President has the power to refuse—I admit that freely—but I assume that no man who has ever occupied the Presidential office, and no man who ever will occupy it, will decline to inform Congress respecting those matters necessary for an intelligent discharge of its duties.

My friend from Wisconsin wants to strike out some of this resolution, but he does not say why.

Mr. SPOONER. I would strike out the word "directed."

Mr. ALLEN. Only the word "directed?" The Senator did not move to strike out the remainder of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; only to strike out the word "directed" and insert "requested."

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know why this amendment is offered, unless it is proposed to put this resolution in an attitude where the President can say that he does not see fit under the circumstances to disclose the information called for by the resolution. I care nothing about the mere matter of form. I do not care whether it is "directed" or "requested." "Requested" is the softer, the milder term; but I understand this word "directed" has been used here without exception. I have heard it discussed, I think, a dozen times since I have been in the Senate, and it has always been finally concluded that the word "directed" is the proper word. But I do not care anything about that technicality; call it "requested," if you will. The thing we want is the information.

Mr. President, if it be true, as has been suggested in certain quarters, that this South African Republic has sent its agents here to be recognized by this Government and we have refused to receive them in consequence of extraneous influences, the world ought to know that. There ought to be no attempt to shirk the responsibility of passing this resolution or to shirk its consequences by hiding behind words and phrases and insinuating that possibly the resolution is not couched in that elegant and stilted language that would be used by an Oriental diplomat.

Here is a Republic almost a hundred years old, complete and perfect in itself. We have at its capital a representative from this Government, and that Government has no representative in Washington, as I was informed a few days ago by the State Department. I had occasion to ask for the information of some constituents of mine for the name of the representative of the South African Republic, and I was told there was no such representative here. We know, Mr. President, as a matter of current history, that one man, if not more, has been appointed by the Transvaal Republic to represent that country at Washington. If the press is to be believed, one at least of those men has applied at the State Department for recognition and has not received it—has not received it, Mr. President, at a time when that Republic needs recognition at the hands of this great Government, at the hands of a sister Republic; and if any hidden or subtle influence has interposed between the State Department and the recognition of the agent of that Government, it is not only proper that the Senate of the United States should know it, but that the people of the United States should know it as well.

I utterly repudiate this un-American theory that Congress and the President are so much more eminent than all other citizens that secrets can be intrusted to them alone. Why, Mr. President, this is not your Government any more than it is mine; it is not mine any more than it is the Government of the 75,000,000 people who are citizens of this nation, all of them, or most of them, eligible to the discharge of public duties in one capacity or another. They pay the taxes; they carry our banner on land and sea; they send the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin and other distinguished gentlemen to this Chamber and to another branch of Congress to represent them; yet, as soon as they come here, we are told that the people do not know enough to be intrusted with this information, and that they ought not to have it; that there must be certain custodians, certain trustees of this valuable information which comes to the Government at Washington, but that the people can not be trusted with it.

I do not want my friend to undertake to put me in a ridiculous light, as he did a moment ago, by claiming that I want negotiations with foreign governments thrown out broadcast to the people before they are completed. Whenever a negotiation is pending, Mr. President, that is not complete and has not passed into history, it ought to remain a secret in the State Department until it is completed; but when it is an accomplished fact and has passed into the history of the country as any other great national fact has passed into its history, there is no reason or propriety in keeping it away from the American people.

Look, if you will, at the studied effort to keep from the American people the negotiations at Paris in connection with the treaty made a year ago last fall. It has been declared upon this floor that the correspondence which passed between the President and the State Department and the Paris commissioners ought never to be made public. Why, Mr. President, what was there, or is there in the correspondence which passed that is so sacred that the world should never know it? If anything passed between the commissioners and another branch of the Government which was not to the credit of this country, it ought to be known by the American people; if it was to the credit of the Government, they ought to know that also; for it is only by knowing the history of their country that they are able properly to criticize the action of this Government and determine what they shall do in the future.

I am willing, if the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senators on the other side of the Chamber want to throttle this resolution, to have it throttled. If you want to take this resolution by the throat and strangle it by putting it in some of the caverns of this Capitol, where it will never see daylight again until Gabriel blows his horn, then put it there. Mr. President, do not let us undertake to strangle it by emasculating it and making it useless and worthless.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska is in a ridiculous attitude in regard to this proposition, he has not been placed in such a status by me.

Mr. ALLEN. I am used to it.

Mr. SPOONER. The responsibility for that will be easily located. I do not take kindly to the notion suggested by the Senator, that because I moved to amend this resolution I am impeaching the intelligence of the people who sent him here. My State sent me here, Mr. President, as his State sent the Senator from Nebraska here, to attend to the business of a great nation in an orderly way, treating it as confidential where the interest of the United States requires it to be treated as confidential, and making it public where it can be made public without detriment to the interests of the United States. I am not sent here to be a demagogue. I am sent here to help, as one member of this body, to transact the public business in harmony with the public interests and in accordance with the Constitution as I understand it, this department treating always the coordinate and independent branches of the Government with that respect to which they are entitled.

I shall take no time in discussing the distinction which my friend was able to discover under our Constitution between the executive and administrative functions of that branch of the Government and the judicial and legislative branches, but, Mr. President, I undertake to say that the wisdom of the amendment which I offered, and the wisdom of the adherence by the Senate to the traditions of the Senate upon this subject, never can be better illustrated than they are by this amendment of the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

What is called for by this resolution, Mr. President? First, the Senator proposes to direct the Secretary of State—to inform the Senate if any person has been accredited representative in any capacity to the United States of America by the South African Republic, commonly known as the Transvaal, and if such person was officially accepted and recognized as such representative by the Government of the United States, and if he was not, for what reason official acceptance and recognition were refused him.

Who accepts representatives from other governments? The Secretary of State? Who receives ambassadors? The Secretary of State? Who refuses to receive ambassadors and other public ministers? The Secretary of State? Whose reason is it, Mr. President, which leads to the acceptance or rejection of ambassadors and other public ministers? It is the President of the United States, not the Secretary of State, who is the mere instrument of the President in the conduct of our foreign relations. The Constitution explicitly confers upon the President the power to accept envoys, ambassadors, and other public ministers. So that this proposition is a proposition that the Secretary of State, in a sense—and I use this language with perfect deference to the Department and its great importance—is the mere right hand of the President, and he is directed to inform the Senate as to an act of the President under a power vested in him and imposed upon him by the Constitution.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the resolution directs the Secretary of State to send us the reasons which caused the President to act one way or the other in the discharge of his constitutional functions. When before has this Cabinet officer ever been directed by resolution of this House, or, so far as I know, of the other House, to transmit the reasons which moved the President in the discharge of his duty, made by the Constitution purely executive? It is not only, in my judgment, a gross piece of impudence, but it is an imputation upon the Senate itself to assume to direct the Secretary of State to transmit to the Senate the reasons which governed the President in his action in the discharge of this purely executive function.

That is not all there is of the resolution. It proceeds:

And the Secretary of State is further directed to inform the Senate of the name of such person, and when he applied for official recognition, and when and for what reason official recognition was refused him.

There it is again. Nor is that all, Mr. President. We might as well consider this subject and have some rule upon it. If it is to be understood that the Senate assumes the function or the power of directing the Secretary of State to lay before the Senate all the transactions of the President in the matter of our foreign relations, let us have it so understood and be governed by it hereafter.

Further than that, this resolution says:

And if any other government, and if so, what government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative of said South African or Transvaal Republic by the Government of the United States.

The communications of foreign governments are with the President, not with the Secretary of State. He is the mere conduit; he may receive the minister and receive the communication, but in contemplation of law it is a communication with the President; it is a communication addressed to the Government; and here the Secretary of State is not only proposed to be directed to send a statement to the Senate of the President's action, and the reasons for the President's action, but he is directed to send to the Senate communications from a foreign government. How many foreign governments will enter into communication or correspondence with the United States if they are given to understand that in a week, or the next month, they can, upon the demand of the Senate—

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose the Senator wants to stay within the facts as to the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. There is not a communication of any kind called for in the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what a protest against the contemplated action by the United States would be unless it were a communication, either in writing or orally. Does the Senator know?

Mr. ALLEN. I was not observing the Senator's question. If he will state it again, I will tell him.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator ought not to criticize my observations if he does not understand them.

Mr. ALLEN. I do understand you when I listen to you, but I do not always listen to you, I regret to say.

Mr. SPOONER. Then you lose something.

Mr. ALLEN. I know I do; but I have been missing these crumbs of wisdom all my life. I wish I could get in shape to listen to the Senator every day.

Mr. SPOONER. I am obliged to listen to the Senator from Nebraska almost every day.

Mr. ALLEN. I know the Senator from Wisconsin does not like my speaking out my sentiments here.

Mr. SPOONER. I do, but I do not like your sentiments; that is all.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; I do not like yours. I am not sent here by the class of people who sent the Senator from Wisconsin here. I am sent here to speak my sentiments; I propose to do that within the rules and orders of this Chamber; and I am not at this time hunting for the approval or disapproval of any Senator who disagrees with me politically.

But I rose to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he is simply sticking in the bark. There is not a communication between the State Department and the Boer Government which is called for by the resolution. I ask the Senator to take up the resolution and read it and find what it does call for.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has had something to say about the class of people who sent me here.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not mean that offensively.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator once lived in Wisconsin.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. SPOONER. I did permit you.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator declines interruption, I shall reply to him at the proper time.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator reflects upon the class of people who sent me here.

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not reflect upon the class of people who sent the Senator here.

Mr. ALLEN. And I did not reflect upon the class of people who sent the Senator from Wisconsin here.

Mr. SPOONER. But I will say one thing, and that is, with the Senator's views upon public questions the class of people who sent me here never would send him here. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. SPOONER. I mean that with due deference to my friend's ability and with full confidence in his integrity.

Mr. ALLEN. With all due deference to the Senator from Wisconsin and to the great people of the great State he represents, that is the highest compliment he could pay me.

Mr. SPOONER. From your standpoint.

Mr. ALLEN. From my standpoint, which is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. I certainly did not intend to become involved in any bandying of words with the Senator from Nebraska. The proposition which he has made here and the amendment which I have offered did not call for it; and I think, when the Senator reads his remarks, he will find no justification for the rudeness of some of his observations.

Mr. ALLEN. If I have said anything rude, I will withdraw it.

Mr. SPOONER. I again read from the resolution:

And if so, what government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative?

The Senator does not ask whether or not any foreign government communicated to this Government upon the subject; but he wants a characterization of their communication, whether they protested or not. Is not that calling for the communication, the substance of it, the character of it? Take the whole proposition, and, as I said before, it is the best possible illustration of the wisdom of the proposition which I make here, that the information called for is the President's information; it is information as to the President's own act, and we have no right to it, although we have a right to request it. This resolution should be amended as I have proposed.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think the occasion warrants probably a remark from me, notwithstanding it may be somewhat burdensome to my friend from Wisconsin. I wish I could put an end to the idea that because I am not with either of the dominant parties here, therefore I must take a back seat entirely and speak only when some gentleman wants me to speak, and remain silent when some gentleman wants me to remain silent. I am not here for that purpose, and I do not propose to do it. I propose to speak in this Chamber, whenever I am within the rules of the Senate, upon any question that is properly before the Senate and when I think the occasion requires it in the interest of the people I am endeavoring in my own way to represent, and who have confidence in my ability to represent them.

No sneering remark by the Senator from Wisconsin, however artfully put, at the people of Nebraska, or that portion of the people of Nebraska who agree with me—for we have Republicans and Populists and Democrats there—no imputation upon their intelligence or upon their patriotism will in the slightest degree deter me from discharging my duty conscientiously as I understand it; and I want to say for the benefit of the Senator from Wisconsin, for whom personally I have the highest conceivable respect, and for his great ability and experience I have respect, that we differ radically and irreconcilably upon policies and upon measures. I have no doubt the Senator's convictions are the result of experience, of reading, of observation. My convictions are the result of the same things, perhaps in more modified form, for I have not dwelt in the high and pure intellectual atmosphere the Senator from Wisconsin has dwelt in from boyhood up; but that is my misfortune. I have got to take my life exactly as I find it. I can struggle with my environments, but I can not always release myself from them or their influence.

Mr. President, the people of Wisconsin—and I had the honor when I was a boy of sojourning there for a little over a year—are a great people. They are as intelligent and as patriotic a people as can be found in the United States. If there were any question about their intelligence, that would be set at rest by the representation they have in this Chamber. But because of this fact it is not necessary for me to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin whenever he capriciously asks me to do so, nor in my school of ethics have I ever understood that it was a proper thing to impute to a man ignorance or viciousness or demagoguery, or something else that is wrong, simply because he disagrees with me. I find men every day who are irreconcilable from my standpoint upon various questions. I have no doubt about my being correct, of course, about those questions, and yet I would not for a moment, for the edification of the galleries or bystanders or anybody else, impute a lack of sincerity or a lack of intelligence or anything of that kind to those men.

This is a serious question, Mr. President. I admit, of course, that the Senator from Wisconsin is a better lawyer than I am.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not hope to convince the Senate of the United States that it would be possible for a Populist to be a good lawyer or a good statesman or to know anything intelligently upon any question. That is illustrative even of the provincialism of the Senate of the United States itself. It is not the part of wisdom, in my judgment, nor is it the part of statesmanship, nor is it the part of ordinary culture and good neighborhood, to assail the intelligence or the motives of a man because you happen to disagree with him. This, of all places, is the place where that ought not to be done.

No man in this Chamber has a higher regard, I repeat, and a more kindly feeling for my distinguished friend from Wisconsin than I have, but I do not want to be nagged from day to day and hour to hour, when I see fit to give my opinions in this Chamber respecting this or any other measure, by the imputation that it is coming from a demagogue or a man who belongs to a political organization which has no standing in the world. You will find out whether it has a standing or not.

While I am upon that subject, Mr. President, I want to say this—and I do not want to digress much, either—that it is studiously circulated throughout the press east of the Alleghany Mountains that the Populist party has gone to pieces. It is sedulously published in the daily and in the weekly press. There are to-day in the United States more Populists loyal to their party than there have ever been in the history of this country. The party is capable of casting distinctly two and a half million votes, and they are not all the votes of fools, either. Yet it is constantly dribbled out studiously and for a purpose that this organization has gone to pieces. An organization of discontented men, it is said. Once in a while you hear a man say that the Populist organization grew up only because the men in it did not receive recognition in the old parties, and you can find people foolish enough to believe that that is true as well as others foolish enough to assert it, and men in high life, too. They will smile and smirk at it as though it is the truth, to the injury of this organization.

This great party grew out of the fact that the Republican party is given to empire and to the destruction of republican form of government. You on the other side of this Chamber do not advocate a doctrine in the interest of the people—not one. You stand for the great banking institutions and the great corporations that fill your political pockets and the coffers of your party as against the masses. Look at the Hepburn letter, which came out here within the last ten days. You say you are in favor of protecting American labor, and to-day you are engaged in a scheme to incorporate with the inhabitants of this country over 12,000,000 pauper laborers to compete with American labor. In 1888 and 1892 and in 1896 you said you were the friends of bimetalism and an enlarged volume of money, and yet you stand in this Chamber to-day without a blush or an excuse in favor of the single gold standard. Where is your boasted patriotism, your boasted intelligence, your boasted policies for the benefit of the country? Yet because I disagree with these oft-asseverated falsehoods, I am to be held up by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin as a poor representative of a poor people.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not do that.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my people are poor—a great many of them. I am poor; poor in this world's goods and poor in intellect, I suppose; but yet I have a right to live; I have a right to my opinions, and those I propose to maintain.

No, Mr. President, this country can not run along in this way. You can not take the 49 per cent of the people of this country who live on the farms and in the little villages and choke them to death without a protest on their part. Thank God, the center of population is moving West; it is on the Mississippi River to-day; and before fifteen years roll around the political power of this nation will be in the West. I call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee to the fact that the time will come when you will wake the sleeping lion of this nation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that this is a very practical question. I think myself the custom has been to address inquiries of this character to the Secretary of State. I do not see any objection to addressing it to the President, if anybody wants it to be addressed to him, although if addressed to the Secretary of State it is practically addressed to the President.

The Constitution, in defining the powers of the President, provides, among other things:

He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

That has been recognized as an absolute control of the Departments by the Executive, and when you address a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury you address it to him, just as you do to the Secretary of the Interior, as the agent or mouthpiece of the President. I have not any doubt that we have a right to call on the President for information; but as I have said two or three times in this debate, it is a matter of discretion with him whether he will respond to it. The Constitution further provides:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

Mr. President, he can do that on his own motion, or he may do it if we call upon him; but in either case it is discretionary with him what he sends. Therefore there is no danger of getting anything in response to the resolution which ought not to come. I think myself, of course, that there should be a proper discretion exercised as to calling upon the President or heads of Departments for information; but whenever we do need the information, we have a right to call for it. The President is a part of the treaty-making power, but not the whole of it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me at this point? I do not want to interrupt his remarks, but it occurs to me that early in the history of this Government it was the habit of the Senate and the House to call upon or direct Cabinet officers to come before them to answer questions, and it was done on more than one occasion.

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember any occasion when a Cabinet officer came, although I have no doubt of the power of Congress to call them here if it saw fit. The President has come into this Chamber in executive session and given his views to the Senate on more than one occasion in the early history of the country.

The President's power over treaties is this:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

It is also provided in another section that he shall receive ambassadors and ministers. I believe that has been construed into a rule that the President shall determine whether they are to be received or not. I do not know how we would interfere with him, although I have not the slightest doubt that we have the right to ask him why he did not receive them. It seems to me that we ought to. We can determine by legislation, I suppose, the relation of this Government to some other government. I do not see why we should not be allowed to call for the information requested here; and if the President did not receive the representative, I can conceive myself of no injury to the public service if he answers that he did not receive him because he did not think he was entitled to be received, and give us the reason.

I do not know whether there has been any recognition of this ambassador, but it seems to me if some one has come here from the Boer Republic we should certainly receive him, because we have a representative there. One has been appointed within the last few weeks. We have recognized their nationality at all events, and if they have sent us a representative for the first time—I do not know that they have ever had one here before—I do not see why we should not recognize him. I do not understand why it should be a one-sided arrangement and we should only have a consul over there. If we have a consul there, we certainly can have a minister if we see fit to send him. It is for us, and not the President, to determine whether or not we will send a minister.

Mr. ALLEN. There is one point to which I want to call the Senator's attention. I meant to state it in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin. The power of the President to receive ambassadors or ministers does not necessarily include the power to recognize consuls and consular agents, and the distinction I wanted to make, but it escaped my mind in the pleasantness of the controversy, was that the Secretary of State is not entitled to any immunity upon the supposition that he is the clerk of the President to receive ambassadors and ministers, etc., because he appointed the consular agent.

Mr. TELLER. We have had a consular agent over there for some years. He having resigned, the present Administration a short time ago appointed his successor. He has gone over there, and I think perhaps by this time he has landed at the capital of the Boer Republic. If Congress had provided for a minister there by appropriating money, as we do when we want a minister, the President would have been compelled to send him there. I do not know any way that he could prevent that.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think so.

Mr. TELLER. Why not? The Senator shakes his head.

Mr. SPOONER. I was merely expressing my opinion.

Mr. TELLER. In the history of this country I do not think there is a precedent where Congress has provided that a minister should go to a country that he has not gone. However, I do not know. Possibly there has been. You can not compel the Executive to do a hundred things that we provide he must do, but there has never been any trouble in having them done, because you must presume that the President will do what is the right thing. If it is the right thing to send a minister to one country or the other, he will go without any question.

What I particularly wanted to say is that there seems to be great emphasis put upon the words "if he thinks it incompatible with the public interest, he need not send the information." Now, we may send to the President a resolution of inquiry of this kind and leave out those words. Does anybody suppose that if he thought it inexpedient and improper to send the information, he would not say so? I do not want the practice to grow up here or to have anybody believe that there is no discretion in the executive department of the Government in reference to these things which they think ought not to be given to the public, and those will be mainly and practically only in connection with the negotiation of treaties; and, as the Senator from Nebraska says, when that thing is accomplished, I do not see any reason why we should not know about it.

The absolute power of the Senate to call for anything touching treaties I do not think can be questioned. Of course they are called for in executive or secret session. We are as much a part of the treaty-making power as the President himself. No treaty can be made without us. No treaty ever has been or ever can be made without us. Unlike the Government of Great Britain, where the executive makes a treaty without reference to Parliament or any other authority, here it is the act of one branch of the legislative government and the President. I do not pretend to say it is a legislative act, but it is a duty put upon this body by the Constitution for the purpose of seeing that no improper treaties are made.

I think perhaps in reference to treaties the Senate is more absolute than in anything else touching our relation to the President; and perhaps, pending a treaty, the President would not be authorized to conceal anything from us which we would be required, possibly under common rules of decency and propriety, to keep from the public, if he should say it was a matter that should not be given to them. I have no doubt he could come here and discuss any treaty with us. I say the precedents are that he could do that.

Practically I do not see any difference whether we address the resolution to the President or to the Secretary. Perhaps we ought to adopt some rule by which we shall be governed in the future. I believe we have addressed a great many more of these inquiries to the Secretary of State than to the President. I do not see any reason for a departure now. I do not think there is any occasion for some of our friends to be so sensitive about these resolutions.

There is nothing, I think, which should be hidden or covered up. If there is, I am in favor of having it uncovered. I shall regret very much if it shall turn out that the Boers have sent an official representative here and that we have failed to recognize him. I do not want to enter into any discussion of the Boer question. It would be impossible for me, however, to see a little Republic struggling against a great power like England and not have my sympathies go out to the people who are trying to maintain their autonomy and, as they think, their liberty. Yet I do not want to do anything that is improper in relation to it. I recognize that we must remain neutral in every respect, but I think we should be as neutral on the other side, to the great power that apparently is getting ready to overwhelm them with tremendous numbers, as we should be with reference to the struggling patriots.

It seems to me there is a great disposition to think we should be very neutral as to the Boers, both in our commerce and our language when we speak about them. I would not say anything that would be offensive to the English people, and yet I would not regard it as offensive to them, nor would I regard myself as an independent man if I were not willing to express my sympathy for the struggling Boers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. Will the Secretary state the amendment? I was not present when it was offered.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, in line 1 of the resolution, to strike out the words "Secretary of State" and insert "President;" in line 2, to strike out the word "directed" and insert "requested;" after the word "Senate," in line 2, to insert "if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest;" and in line 8, to strike out the words "and the Secretary of State is further directed" and insert the word "also."

Mr. CHANDLER. Read the whole resolution as it is proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. If amended, the resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, if any person has been accredited representative in any capacity to the United States of America by the South African Republic, commonly known as the Transvaal, and if such person was officially accepted and recognized as such representative by the Government of the United States, and if he was not, for what reason official acceptance and recognition were refused him; also to inform the Senate of the name of such person, and when he applied for official recognition, and when and for what reason official recognition was refused him, and if any other government, and if so, what government, or its official representative or representatives, objected or protested against the official recognition of such proposed representative of said South African or Transvaal Republic by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think it very essential, as to the form of a resolution calling for information in respect of our relations with any foreign people, whether it be directed to the President or to the Secretary of State. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that substantially the same result will be reached either way. In connection with a resolution which I drew and presented to the Senate, calling for information relating to certain seizures of American property by the British military authorities, I examined the subject and found that resolutions had been offered in either way. Of course the largest discretion finally rests with the President, and if it goes to the Secretary of State the compelling mind will be that of the President. So it does not seem to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is very essential, in view of the action of the Senate; and yesterday, upon a resolution which I offered in the Senate, the President was substituted for the Secretary of State.

But, Mr. President, one thing is essential in the present natural, undeniable sentiment of the American people, and that is, that either the President or the Secretary of State shall give to the American people, through Congress or through the Senate, full information as to what has taken place in any negotiations. I had not supposed until the intimations which I have heard to-day that any duly accredited representative from the Transvaal Republic had appeared in Washington and had been rejected by the President of the United States when his intercession was offered and when his credentials, whatever they may have been, were presented. I should deem it a most unfortunate event if that occurred. I do not believe it has occurred.

I have heard that irresponsible, unaccredited parties, perhaps citizens of the United States, had appeared in Washington and had claimed to represent this gallant people which is to-day struggling for its liberty and its home government, but no such mission can be for one moment regarded either by the Secretary of State or the President. I have yet to be made to believe that a duly accredited representative of that great people in South Africa has appeared before the President of the United States and has been denied hearing and admission; and the sooner we are informed by the President or the Secretary of State, whichever it may be, that it is not true, the better for the American people.

I do not fail to take notice that throughout the length and breadth of the land the sympathies of the great American people are in favor of the struggle that the Boers are making to-day to maintain liberty, to preserve a republican government against one of the greatest powers of the world. I do not doubt that the American people agree with me that the war which Great Britain is waging against the Boer Republic is the most fell blow at human liberty that has been struck in the last century, and I do not doubt that the Administration, representing the great people of the United States, feels to-day as I feel upon this subject and as I believe nine out of ten of the American people feel. I read only a little while ago from a deliberate, prepared speech, such as members of the British ministry make either before their constituents directly or in some prominent place in England, the following utterance of the leader of the present government in the House of Commons, Mr. Balfour, made at East Manchester:

I know of no war in which Great Britain has been engaged, except that resulting in the independence of the American colonies, which did not end triumphantly. Yet I do not know of one which has begun triumphantly. True, the war in South Africa is disappointing, but it is not a fact that Great Britain has suffered exceptional reverses or great disaster. On the other hand—the war has knit together every branch of the English-speaking race, making all feel that they have a great, common destiny which it is their duty to accomplish.

I deny, sir, that the American people are in sympathy with the administration of Great Britain in the war in which it is engaged to stamp out human liberty. I deny that the section of the English-speaking race that lives on this continent is to be carried on and tied to its chariot wheel in the war that is now being waged against the Republic in South Africa. When the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons stands before the world and asserts that, he must be met by some disclaimer from this side.

Nor do I wish complications or war with any people. I remember that we have not been so much in love with neutrality in the days passed that we could not speak up boldly for Hungary and Poland and Armenia and Cuba, and Greece, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggests to me. I do not know how it is that to-day we must be asked to speak with bated breath in favor of liberty because liberty is assailed in Africa instead of in Europe or Asia or America.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would suggest to the Senator, or would ask the Senator, whether it is not because the American people, the larger proportion of them, possibly a majority of them, I believe a big majority, believe that we are engaged in similar business in the Philippines?

Mr. HALE. Oh, well, Mr. President, whatever I may think about the Philippine performance, whether I agree or disagree with the Senator, that is not involved here. I should say, Mr. President, if the result of our complications with the Philippines is that we dare not speak for liberty and a struggling people anywhere, that that is the greatest demonstration of what a calamitous thing the Philippine war is. But I do not think the time has come when we are obliged to speak with bated breath in favor of liberty anywhere.

I do not count this as a movement, as a sentiment against the English race, nor against the English people, nor against England. I do not believe that the English people are in favor of this war, or ever have been. I believe that the great Queen on her bended knees has prayed that this war may be averted from her. I do not think that the great premier, the head of the present administration, favored this war. It is the act and the movement of a sharp, predatory cabinet minister, engaged with a gold speculator, that has forced the English people into this war.

I am glad in the humiliation that has fallen upon Great Britain; it is not we who have given it to her. I remember an old friend, a neighbor of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], told the story once before of England's humiliation:

There is weeping by England's hundred streams,
By Severn and Thames and Trent;
And o'er the graves of her fallen braves
The Queen of the Sea is bent.

One lesson should serve this haughty isle,
Girt round with stately towers;
Thank God, the blow that has laid her low
Was dealt by no hand of ours.

I fully sympathize with that feeling, Mr. President. I do not in any way hate the English people, but my whole heart is aroused at the contemplation of a people with an established government seeking to maintain it in republican form when it is sought to be overwhelmed by the forces of one of the greatest empires of the day, which itself claims to be an exponent and apostle of human liberty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and the action of the House requesting a conference with the Senate on the bill and amendments.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and agree to the conference requested.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CARTER, Mr. HALE, and Mr. MCENERY were appointed.

AGREEMENT WITH BANNOCK AND SHOSHONE INDIANS.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask that the Senate resume consideration of the bill (S. 255) to ratify an agreement made with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, in Idaho, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, that the reading may be completed, and the bill be placed on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, before the reading commences I desire to make a few remarks, which will take up but a minute, in order that the Senate may generally understand the condition of affairs that exists on that reservation.

There is a town named Pocatello in the heart of the reservation. It had, according to the last census, nearly 4,000 people. To-day, in my judgment, there are something over 5,000 people in the town. It is in the heart of the reservation. This town site was purchased from the Indians, and the Indians realized something over a hundred thousand dollars from the sale of town lots. I deemed it proper that I should make this statement. The passage of this bill is desired by the people living in that part of the country, and throughout the entire State, in fact. It is concurred in by my colleague [Mr. HEITFELD] and also by the member of the other House from that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read that portion of the bill which has not hitherto been read.

Mr. LODGE. It was partly read the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was nearly all read the other day.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. The preamble was agreed to.

REGISTER FOR STEAM WHALER BOWHEAD.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1933) to provide an American register for the steam whaler Bowhead. It is a very short bill, and it is very important to get it passed as soon as possible. I do not think it will cause any objection whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to add at the end of the bill "whenever it shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the repairs put upon such vessel in the United States are equal to three-fourths of the cost of such vessel when so repaired;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steam whaler Bowhead, owned by John A. Cook, Preston B. Keith, F. B. Howard, E. T. Packard, D. W. Field, A. W. Barrows, George Bickford, W. H. Bryant, and H. B. Madison, citizens of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States, whenever it shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the repairs put upon such vessel in the United States are equal to three-fourths of the cost of such vessel when so repaired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRY DOCKS AT LEAGUE ISLAND AND MARE ISLAND.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to change the material to be used in the construction of the dry docks at the navy-yards at League Island, Pa., and Mare Island, Cal., from timber to concrete and stone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield for a moment, so as to permit the passage of this bill. It is very important, as the work of construction is held up at those two great yards.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is no debate I will yield, but I desire very much to control my time to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to change the material to be used in the construction of the dry docks at the navy-yards at League Island, Pa., and Mare Island, Cal., from timber to concrete and stone.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 9, after the word "not," to insert "in the aggregate;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1898, relating to the construction of dry docks, as modified by "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, are hereby further modified so that the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, contract for the construction of dry docks at League Island, Pa., and Mare Island, Cal., in addition to those at Boston, Mass., and Portsmouth, N. H., to be built of concrete and stone, and in such case the limit of cost of the dry docks for Mare Island, Cal., and League Island, Pa., is so far modified that the total additional increased cost for the two dry docks aforesaid shall not in the aggregate exceed $700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in discussing this bill, which is the regular order, I set out with the proposition that it does not affect the real issue now before the country whether the standard measure of a dollar is 371½ grains of pure silver or 23.22 grains of pure gold. The dollar is the same, whether it is made of gold or silver. It is a measure like a yardstick or a foot measure, and it is the same whether it is made of gold or silver, and if we adopt either, or both, as the measure of a dollar, the dollar is the same.

The real question is, Shall we have bimetallicism; shall we have dollars made of gold and also of silver, or shall gold dollars alone be coined in the mints, invested alone with full legal-tender power, and shall silver dollars be denied these qualities, privileges, and powers?

The question now is, as it was in 1873, Shall the silver dollar be dropped from the coinage and its legal-tender power depraved to the condition it was placed in by the act of 1873, when it was made a legal tender only for the sum of $10 in one payment? Since 1873 the friends of silver money, who are the friends of an unimpeached and inviolable Constitution, have worked with a zeal that has never faltered to restore silver legal-tender dollars to the people, and they have so far succeeded that they have caused to be coined $501,335,550, the product of our mines, which is now in circulation among our people.

Of this sum $345,040,347 is held in the Treasury on special deposit to redeem silver certificates of the same amount. This has been done to meet a mere convenience of trade and commerce. This silver coin and its representative silver certificates stand in the way of the issues of notes by the national banks. It occupies a field that otherwise would be occupied by national-bank circulation, and its removal is their fixed purpose, as it is the real object of this bill.

Silver dollars circulate in the country and hold the volume of currency at a steady and firm standard of supply. This silver money prevents the banks from reducing the volume of circulating currency when it is desired by their controllers to put down the price of property and crops, and from increasing the volume and raising the price of property and productions after they have passed out of the hands of first owners and producers.

The complete dominion over the currency of this country will be established by this bill in the hands of the national banks. That must be its leading purpose, as all its provisions lead to that result. When this power is established the banks will have no competitor in the whole field of money circulation except gold coins.

Gold coins are not and will not be in common use by our people. There are no gold coins of less size than $2.50 pieces. As to the gold dollar, that form of coinage is abolished. Subsidiary silver coin will do the work of trade and commerce in all minor transactions, which, in the aggregate, are really the major transactions, and paper issues of the national banks will do the rest when this bill becomes a law.

To clear the field of all other paper-money competition, so as to give the national banks full swing, this bill provides for retiring the greenback circulation of $346,000,000. It destroys the greenback by changing it to a gold certificate of deposit. When this is done and silver dollars are driven out, we must find gold or national-bank notes to fill a void of $850,000,000.

The bill provides for the issue of notes by national banks to the full amount of the United States bonds deposited by them to secure their redemption, which is logical; but it increases the power of the banks 10 per cent to control the volume of the currency, while it does not compel them to issue any amount of notes, and leaves it in their power at their will to create either a money famine or a money inundation.

The power to create money and to destroy it by refusing loans and by calling loans is absolute, except to the extent that the gold in the country will supply a resisting force to counteract such movements, and it is impotent for that purpose. Such power lodged in the hands of 3,505 corporations, all cooperating, as they do work together in perfect harmony, is of itself the supreme master of the people, and its authority is absolute.

When we recur to the fact that this ruling power is sustained entirely by the taxation of the people, and that the capital on which its circulating notes are based is exempt from taxation, the monopoly it creates for private gain, by usurping the power to create money, is the most complete and the most onerous and unjust that exists in any country.

This bill legalizes the usurpation by the national banks of the power to create money.

It then provides for the perpetuity of the national debt and for its increase by the sum of $50,000,000 whenever the holders of greenbacks can contrive to reduce the gold reserve in the Treasury below $100,000,000.

The "endless chain" process of depleting the gold held in the reserve fund in the Treasury that caused the issue of bonds in the Cleveland Administration—so fatal to the Democratic party—is carefully provided for and arranged in this bill by separating this fund from the general fund in the Treasury and by providing that all redemptions of greenbacks or Treasury notes shall be made from it and not from the general fund in the Treasury.

Having thus segregated it as a mark for financial archery, there is the provision that it shall at no time exceed $150,000,000, and shall justify and require the issue of bonds whenever it falls below $100,000,000.

All that the financiers who work the crank that turns the machinery that moves this "endless chain" have to do to create a gold panic is to accumulate a fund of $51,000,000 and run the reserve below the minimum. When that is done, the bill provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to restore the same to the maximum," which means that he shall issue $50,000,000 of bonds, no less and no more.

To force an issue of bonds to the amount of $50,000,000 the financial operators have the help of the greenbacks, amounting to $346,000,000, the Treasury notes, amounting to about $85,000,000, and "all forms of money issued or coined by the United States," including national-bank notes, amounting to about $200,345,567, and silver coins, with which to move against the Treasury in the demand for gold. One column of attack, consisting of the greenback and Treasury-note corps, will move against the reserve fund, and the other, consisting of national-bank notes and all other "forms of money issued or coined by the United States," will move against the Treasury to prevent the reinforcement of the reserve fund.

Thus corralled and shut up in a financial jug, the Secretary of the Treasury will hasten to issue bonds in batches of $50,000,000 as often as this sham battle shall be waged.

No more astute contrivance or more complete machinery was ever devised for the transfer of the capital of the country into interest-bearing and non-taxable securities than is set forth in the provisions of this bill.

The pretext for all this, and for changing the existing debt of the United States into a debt in perpetuity, is that it is proper, not that it is necessary, to reaffirm the state of the law as it is alleged to exist under section 3511 of the Revised Statutes.

If the gold standard exists it is not necessary to reaffirm or reenact it.

It is merely set at the head of the column of a new and disastrous invasion of the rights of the people, intended for another and a perpetual subjugation of the masses who toil to the money power. They are invited to follow the gold standard and plant it on the Capitol under the battle cry of "sound money." But they and their children are led into the perpetual bondage of a perpetual national debt on which they must earn and pay the interest to men who pay no taxes.

If we have the gold standard now, why do we wish a new law to establish it? If we are able to carry on war with a great fleet and an army of 65,000 men in the Philippines and at the same time to pile up such a surplus in the Treasury that our Secretary, to get rid of it, is buying our bonds at a heavy premium, why do we wish to change this situation by making it impossible that the excessive fruits of our prosperity shall be applied to our debt, and why do they decree that it shall be made perpetual?

The answer is too plain to escape a child; it is, simply that the national banks see that the vigor and power of our people are growing with the new zeal of a new era in the history of this great Republic; that the resources of the people are expanding with the power and glory of the Republic, and that the people are lifting the bondson which the foundations of the banks are laid, and they find that they will soon have to give up their vast monopoly.

The Democratic party never had a prouder or more patriotic mission, nor was a more glorious declaration ever made in their creed, than its constant demand for the payment of the national debt. If we adhere to that slogan and prove that we are true to ourselves, we shall not fail to win this great battle for the people.

When the national banks, with their stocks rating at such enormous figures that $100 of stock sometimes sells in the market for more than $4,000, shall have no longer any public debt on which to build these temples dedicated to the golden god, they will cease to create money and will give way to Divine Providence, who created gold and silver for mankind. Then they will cease to usurp the power of making money in the place of the Government and will begin to place their great wealth where it will be a blessing to mankind.

So long as the public debt exists the banks and their owners will have the power to dictate to the politicians the sort of money that is best suited to their purposes and the quantity that will bring them the greatest profit, and the people—the real burden bearers—will be compelled to submit. When our national debt is paid, the banking of the country will change from the bond basis to the old Democratic specie basis, and in that basis silver, legal-tender money, is always a factor of equal power with gold.

This bill presents for the first time the direct and true financial issue between the Democratic and Republican parties, and the question is, Shall we pay our national debt, according to its obligation, in coin, or shall we change the obligation to gold and make the debt perpetual?

In this question is involved the destiny of our race in this Republic.

As yet the feudal principle, which in Europe is changed from land tenures to corporate stocks and banking and money power, has not laid the cold and relentless grasp of the law upon our people.

In this bill we have the initiative, and we will soon feel the drawing of the chains of a fearful fate. When our debt again goes up to two or three billions, as it will, there to remain as a perpetual incubus upon the country, the lines between the classes who hold the bonds and those who pay the interest on them and the taxes will be as clearly defined as they are in England, and it will then be better for the laborer to adopt a good master than for him to indulge the flattering vanity that he is a free and independent man.

I am not speaking of social position and its advantages, but of labor and the vast distance that lies between the man who earns bread and the man who eats it. When our country is fully and finally stocked up with distinct classes of bondholders and laboring taxpayers, it will not matter much to either class whether the other has the enjoyment of true and sincere American liberties. There is too much of that jealousy now for the good of the Republic.

It is not the wealth or grandeur of any man of which a true American is jealous, but when wealth is living on his labor and uses its power to interfere with all his affairs there is danger of disturbance; when one class is enabled by law to use its power against another class so as to oppress it, they will divide into hostile camps. That condition is already nearly approached.

In all the service I have tried to render to free silver for more than a quarter of a century I have been led and directed by two prominent considerations. The first is the necessity to our people, to their productions and the preservation of their national spirit, that our country should enjoy full independence in its financial policy, free from the control of any foreign power.

To establish and maintain this independence, we have an isolated position in our geography that frees us from the influence of old countries and dynasties, that use the power to create money as they use the sword to maintain absolutism and to enrich the crown at the expense of the people. We have, through the grace and bounty of Providence, a surplus of production in everything we try to grow or manufacture, and an almost exclusive monopoly of some of the leading staple articles of the commerce of the world. Added to these, we have fisheries on both coasts that furnish food at the lowest cost and in the most attractive form to the millions who toil—the free gift of the seas.

Then our mines of iron, copper, gold, and silver yield more than we need of these precious metals to furnish the capital to produce, manufacture, and transport all of these vast stores of true wealth without seeking the aid of the credit of anybody.

With such resources and such a natural money supply in the control of this peculiarly independent and strong people we do not need an artificial basis on which to build up a financial system. What we need is the time-honored specie basis of the old Democratic party anchored in the Constitution and composed alike of gold and silver coin. Give us that, and all other things will be added unto us.

Another leading reason why I have so earnestly favored the full and free coinage of silver is that it is gathered by the toil of man in the deep and dangerous mines; it is converted into coin by the highest art of the chemist; it is the gift of God, who made silver and gold alone for use as money in their functions of real value, and it is the reward in money, not in promises to pay, of the laborer; the reward of each day's work when the night shuts in. It is the fruit of the pick and the shovel, and is not the product of some artful brain in a bank parlor that is busy with contrivances to deceive the world into the belief that his credit is better for the people than this gift from heaven and that his wisdom has made a back number of the omniscience of God.

It is not cant or demagoguery to say that silver is "the poor man's money." It is the real, living truth, and a more important fact in finance, industry, prosperity, and the equal rights of man was never stated. As men are educated in a knowledge of their natural and political rights this universal truth will grow in importance and it will assert itself against all who oppose it, whether they are kings on their thrones or bankers in their palaces, until it is recognized as a supreme power. Silver money is the real life of trade and commerce among the laboring and indigent classes, and they have a better right to it, in full supply, than the wealthy and more thrifty people have to the full supply of gold and the towering fabrics of credit they build on that foundation.

The poor can not exist without silver money. The loaf of bread, the scrap of meat, the tattered, second-hand garment, and the fire that scarcely dares to burn in the little stove to warm the children in the ragpicker's house are bought with silver money, not with gold or credit, and it is to them the last hold they have upon existence.

When the people are deprived of it they simply die and are cast out and forgotten of all except the God of mercy. The ravages of cholera, bubonic plague, and the black death are often due to the want of silver money among the poor. They starve first, and then they become wretched in helpless filth, and then, with a sort of retributive justice, they poison the world as they leave it. The best disinfection that could be provided is to give these miserable men, women, and children—for they are still men, women, and children—a chance to earn a little silver money to supply their physical necessities.

But it is not only the very poor who need and must have silver money. The richest man in Washington can not supply his daily wants without it.

It is the great and noble class of thrifty working people on the farms and in the mines and factories who are most in need of silver money, and the millions who toil in an infinite variety of employments in the great cities must have it.

If silver money was or could be driven out of the great cities of the world, if it were made a crime to use it, as it is to use counterfeit or clipped coin, not one of them could stand for a week against the indignant mobs that would destroy everything that stood in their way.

Governments would perish and peoples rush to ruin under such a decree. It is no more possible to conduct government without the use of silver money than it is to float a ship in a desert.

This being true, why should any government set to work to dishonor or to destroy silver money, in defiance of all political economy and in a scoffing contempt of the divine laws of the Creator of men and nations?

There can be but one answer to this question. It is that politicians are in the power of a mighty class who use the powers of government to give increased and unnatural value to gold money, because they can use it to advantage in their business at the expense of silver money, without which those who are the toilers in the daily walks of life can not and do not transact any business. It is the greed of monopoly, supported and fostered by the laws, that gives life and impulse to this fatal movement.

This bill stands at "the parting of the ways" in the history of this great country, and prescribes separate paths for its homogeneous and most worthy people.

We have lived and worked and fought and prayed together without class distinctions until we have made American institutions the honest admiration of mankind, and now a bill is brought in by a great party in the hour of a great national triumph which creates two classes among our people and makes a cleavage between them that is to be perpetual.

The untaxed bondholders and the great corporation trusts are aligned on one side and the taxpayers, toilers, and producing classes on the other side.

And all this is to be done under the false and miserable pretext that it is best to affirm a doctrine, which they assert is already fixed in the law, that the true standard measure of a dollar is a gold standard.

Not for one moment have I ever doubted that the real purpose of the leaders of the Republican party is to force the country back to the precise condition it was in when the Sherman Act of 1873 was passed. The Democracy, aided by other political parties, have worked without ceasing for nearly thirty years to restore the country from the terrible blow then inflicted upon us, a blow that was launched in the Bank of England and delivered against us by a British agent.

In that time we have restored the full legal-tender power of the silver dollar and its partial and temporary coinage until we have given to the people 501,000,000 silver dollars, the product of American mines.

This contribution to the permanent wealth of the country has done its work in the farms, workshops, and mines, and has been paying debts and buying property in the smaller dealings that the banks never stoop to handle.

It has probably been the commercial medium of five or even ten billions of dollars in business transactions, which would have been greatly embarrassed, if not prevented, in the absence of these silver dollars. But, far beyond this, the Government has literally lived upon these silver dollars and their representatives, silver certificates, and is living upon them to-day.

They have tided the banks and the Treasury over panics that have three times convulsed Europe and America. These silver dollars have supported our fleets and armies during the Spanish war and are doing that work to-day in the Philippine insurrection. They are paying all our officers and agents of Government, and are indispensable to every line of business in the country.

So true is this that the gold men in this bill are trying to seize upon silver dollars and silver certificates and wash them over with gold so as to appropriate them to their service, but they enter in this bill a final decree that there should be no more of them. They wish to coffin them in gold and lay them away in their vaults.

To test the truth of what I am saying, let us try to imagine the condition of our country if these 500,000,000 of silver dollars and silver certificates were suddenly retired from circulation and gold coin was invited to fill the vacuum. It would be a disaster that no imagination could conceive of, and it is useless to attempt to describe it in any other phrase than universal ruin.

The labor of the Democratic party—sometimes requited with treason in high places to party fealty and the creed and practice of our Democratic fathers during seventy-two years of splendid success—has been to haul the country out of the grave dug for it by the Sherman Act of 1873. The labor of the Republican party has been to haul it back into that bottomless pit. This bill is the final act that will land us again at this zero of financial and industrial depression. There is no law for the coinage of silver dollars, except for a few parcels of bullion left over under the Bland-Allison law.

If Mr. Cleveland had been a Republican President, as he well deserved to be, we would now have a law for the coinage of silver dollars from the product of American mines.

The Bland-Allison Act, an unfortunate compromise, restored grudgingly the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, and these features of the law, backed by the faith of the American people in silver money, has enabled the legal-tender power of these $501,000,000 of silver to carry the Government on their shoulders in peace and in war and thus far to battle with the combined powers of gold, bondholders, and monopoly in Europe and America, and with 4,000 national banks.

To break this legal-tender power of the silver dollar is the final effort of this bill. It discredits silver as an independent, self-sustaining money metal by providing for its redemption in gold, as an imbecile is discredited by having a guardian set over him in authority.

Silver coins in the Treasury are to be kept there under this bill and silver certificates are to be issued in their stead, and these are made redeemable in gold. Very soon the courts will follow this declared public policy, and a tender of more than ten silver dollars in payment of a debt will be held to be insufficient under this law of public policy.

But there is more than that, Mr. President, as to the purpose of this particular measure. I find in the House bill the following provision:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

Why this committee has ex industria stricken out that provision of the House bill which preserved the legal-tender power and quality of the silver dollar is something that is incomprehensible, except upon the hypothesis that this bill is so framed by design and purpose as that that fact is accomplished by a concealment of the purpose; but, in fact, by a proper legal construction of the meaning of the bill it destroys the legal-tender function of silver dollars.

When this is accomplished silver dollars will be more completely destroyed in their money functions than they were, even under the Sherman Act of 1873.

The Republicans are about to arrive at their haven of hope, and the Democracy, which means the people, will have to renew the battle that began more than thirty years ago. If the people can see their danger while the illuminations of national prosperity and glory are ablaze, they will rise in November and wipe out the Sherman Act of 1873 and this bill, which is intended to be the consummation of its wickedness.

They will scorn and repudiate this effort of Congress to repudiate and annul the express terms of their bonded debt, and will demand the right to pay it, according to agreement, in either gold or silver coin of a standard value fixed in that contract.

In the progress of events that no human brain has devised or could accomplish, and they may therefore be reverently ascribed to Divine Providence, new factors have entered the financial situation for which, of necessity, and for the sake of national honor, we must provide. We have acquired the control over the future government of 18,000,000 people.

How or why this has been done, or how this dominion will be exerted, is a matter foreign to this present discussion. We found them in tatters and humiliation under the iron rule of a cruel despotism, and it is our noble task to clothe them and put them in their right mind.

Their first and greatest need is money—silver money—because that is the money they are accustomed to use.

The Spanish peseta, at 40 per cent discount in American money, is returning to Spain, where it is at par with Spanish gold. This hegira of silver has left all these Spanish islands with a circulation of less than $3 per capita. If we would do justice to them we would increase this allowance of silver to them up to $10 per capita. Estimating their numbers at 12,000,000, this is a new demand upon us for $120,000,000.

The product of our mines, after supplying the home demand for the arts and subsidiary coinage, is less by about $10,000,000 than this new demand and market for silver, and this $10,000,000 is a little more than the amount of the excess of the world's supply of silver bullion for the year ending July 1, 1899.

How plain and simple, then, is our power to place silver on a commercial equality with gold, at the rate of 16 to 1, if we do not forget or refuse to do our duty to these new wards of the nation.

A simple blow like this would unshackle the limbs of the people of India, and in turn it would unfetter the world of poor, shrinking, starving people. Shall I ask sordid men to approve a national benevolence that would win the hearts of all the people of all the Spanish islands and wed them to us in bonds that fleets and armies can not create? I despair of this, but I do not despair of the power of a resolute minority, sustained by humanity, national duty, and the corresponding rights and interests of our own people, to force this measure of justice or some other measure in which the government of those people is to be provided for.

For one I will glory in the honor of assisting in this battle for the rights and welfare of those people.

What has come to us, Mr. President, and is called "expansion"—which I conceive to be a necessary growth from conditions that we have removed, and were necessarily followed by war—has brought to us this great opportunity to do our own people in this country full justice and at the same time to comply with the honorable obligation we are under to those thirteen millions of newcomers to supply them with all the legislative measures necessary for their prosperity. They have no mines; they have no mints; they have no credit; their bonds could not be marketed in any part of the world, even if they had separate independence in Cuba, and as to the others of course that is an impossibility. They are entirely at our disposal and under our control as to all of their industrial affairs that are dependent upon financial conditions.

I do not understand how any American Senator can look over this broad and splendid field of opportunity and demand and deny to himself the privilege of providing this true bond of union between these Spanish possessions and the United States. If we cut deep the grooves of commerce by establishing between us and those islands a system of finance in which there shall be no premium for exchanges we shall have no occasion at any time hereafter to doubt or distrust our complete commercial control over those people, so far as we desire to exercise it; and by that I mean a control that shall be mutually and honorably advantageous to them as well as to us.

What is called expansion, which was the result of a treaty of peace with Spain, throwing our border lines around distant countries, has become a fixed fact; and yet it is often referred to on the floor of the Senate as if it were something in the future to be realized. We hear it suggested that if annexation shall take place, for instance, between the Philippine Islands and the United States, then certain policies are to be adopted, which of course implies that if annexation does not take place, those policies would be inapt or improper.

Sir, if it is possible to create an act of annexation by the supreme law of the United States in accordance with our Constitution and the laws of nations, the Philippines are annexed. Whether that takes within their borders the international law—the private laws of nations I refer to particularly—or whether it takes ex proprio vigore the Constitution of the United States in all its efficacy, whatever the government may be there and whether it may exist after that treaty has been ratified and confirmed as it has existed from that time until now, without deriving assistance from any special act of Congress, seems to me to make no difference as to the question of our supreme and sovereign title to and dominion over that country.

Mr. President, Congress can supply, and perhaps in a very brief period of time must supply, these people with a financial system, and that, of all the other matters connected with these outlying possessions, is by far the most important. Now, sir, I expect when bills are brought forward for the government of these Spanish possessions, if I am present in the Senate, to offer amendments to those bills, unless the committee shall report something that is agreeable to my views, to the effect that the Congress of the United States will make a special provision for financing those different islands and relieving them, as far as possible, from the burdens which have been left upon them by Spain in the course of its tyrannical and exhausting government. This question can not be avoided, and I can not conceive that the blind adhesion of anyone to a particular theory of finance is going to forbid him from supplying these people with that description of money and in that quantity which is necessary for their real prosperity, and without which, it appears, they have never had any true prosperity, and I suppose they never will.

I wish to bring this subject up in the hope that some gentleman on my side of this question, some gentleman who is opposing the bill, who is not in favor of it (not for the purpose of breaking it down, but for the purpose of trying to improve it), and the still brighter hope that some person on that side of the Chamber who favors the bill, will add to it a provision by which the finances of these different islands acquired from Spain shall be arranged. So far as Hawaiian government is concerned, a bill has been reported here from the commission that was sent out there, and it has gone, I believe, to the Committee on Finance. I do not know what attention it may have received.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations and is now in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Without amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. I mean the general annexation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I speak of the special bill in regard to currency and coinage.

Mr. CULLOM. There has been nothing done yet in regard to that measure.

Mr. MORGAN. It will be very necessary to dispose of that question in regard to Hawaii, as much so as in regard to the tariff or any other provision of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Hawaiian Government had a system of finance which was almost exactly like that of the United States. They use our gold and silver coins without discount. They coined $1,000,000 of silver coin, and they fixed it at the same weight and standard of value and put upon it the impress simply of the Hawaiian Government. It was coined in the mint at San Francisco. They have a postal savings or banking system there which seems to have operated very beneficially to the people, and that has to be rearranged, either approved and adopted or else changed by act of Congress.

In dealing with this subject I propose to leave Hawaii to stand upon the ground which she herself has selected, for her system needs almost no change at all to make it completely harmonious with the financial system of the United States. But in regard to the Spanish possessions there is need of radical change—a change in the fundamental principles and provisions of the entire line of financial policy—and it is to that subject that I am addressing my attention at this moment and expressing the hope that some gentleman connected with this bill, in support of it, will give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon a special provision designed for the benefit of the Spanish islands.

If that provision is carried out by the coinage of silver bullion dug from American mines after the date of the passage of the bill, excluding all silver dug before, we will find that our mines in this country will supply a sufficiency in two years to give to those people a per capita allowance of silver of $10. We will find also in doing that that we will in our coinage consume so much of the silver supply of the world that we will leave a deficit in that supply of at least $2,000,000, and whenever it appears that there is a deficit in the silver supply of the whole world I shall be hard to convince that that will not put the commercial value of silver at least at par with gold at 16 to 1.

With an instrumentality thus thrown in our hands by the provision God has made in the mines and the other provision which He must have made to bring about these new conditions under which we are now living, why shall we not, for the sake at least of assisting those people, whether ours are to be benefited by it or not, relax our rigid adherence to certain academic doctrines and principles and proceed like wise men ought to work in supplying currency to these Spanish islands?

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ARSENALS AT SPRINGFIELD AND ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the change of reference of a communication from the Treasury Department in regard to the armories at Springfield and at Rock Island.

I want, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement of my reasons for making that motion to reconsider.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, there is so much noise in the House that it is absolutely impossible to hear what the gentleman from Iowa says.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The public business has begun, and gentlemen will please cease conversation and resume their seats.

Mr. HULL. I will repeat what I said, that on yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the action of the House by which the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the consideration of appropriations for the armories at Springfield and Rock Island, and the same were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

I tried to enter an objection at the time, but did not succeed, and the Speaker recognized me to enter that motion. My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that this is not a debatable question. Am I correct in that?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HULL. Then I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a brief statement of my reasons for making this motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent to be permitted to make a brief statement in support of his motion to reconsider the order of the House concerning the reference of a part of Document 221. Is there objection?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make an objection, but, as I understand, it refers to the arsenal at Springfield, Mass.

Mr. HULL. Yes, that is one of the arsenals referred to.

Mr. KNOX. I see that my colleague [Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts] is not in his place.

Mr. HULL. This does not affect anything except the question as to which committee shall consider it.

Mr. KNOX. Had my colleague [Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts] any notice as to when this was to come up? Did he have notice that it was to come up this morning?

Mr. HULL. I entered that motion yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have just entered the Hall. What is the matter under consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HULL) to reconsider.

Mr. PAYNE. He wants a chance to be heard on his motion.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will let that go over until Monday.

Mr. HULL. Well, on what ground?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, the gentleman makes his motion to reconsider, and I think a brief period for examination will perhaps hasten the discussion.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to make my request that the gentleman from Illinois be also given the privilege of making a statement for his committee if he desires to.

Mr. CANNON. Well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted also to make a statement.

Mr. CANNON. Is the motion to reconsider called up?

The SPEAKER. The motion was entered last night, and it is now called up by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that an exceeding press of business from the Committee on Appropriations, as well as duties on the Committee on Insular Affairs, have so engrossed my attention for a week that I have been under considerable pressure, and no harm can come by unanimous consent being given that this matter go over until Monday morning.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois puts it on the ground that he has not had time to examine it I will not enter any objection to the matter going over, but will ask that it come up immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. It may come up at any time. The gentleman withdraws his request.

Mr. HULL. For how many days may it come up?

The SPEAKER. It may be called up at any time by the gentleman from Iowa.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced the change of reference of House Document No. 294, being letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of David I. Lillard against the United States, from the Committee on War Claims to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER also announced the change of reference of the bill (H. R. 4746) to authorize the Delaware Indians of the Cherokee Nation to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States, and the Mississippi Choctaws to sue the Choctaw Nation, and for other purposes, from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WAGON AND MOTOR BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER AT ST. CHARLES, MO.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Speaker's table, for present consideration, the bill S. 2284. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2284) extending the time for the completion of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by an act approved June 3, 1896.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as fixed by an act approved June 3, 1896, be extended to June 3, 1902.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6627) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6627, being the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, I desire to make some arrangement with the gentleman as to general debate on that bill.

Mr. BARNEY. I would state to my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia, that so far as I know little time will be desired on this side of the House for general debate. Of course, I am willing to enter into any arrangement that is reasonable for the purpose of general debate on this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, we may just as well go on, and we can agree when we get in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARNEY. All right; perhaps that is the best way.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6627, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6627) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, the amount carried in this bill is $144,245,230, about the same amount that was carried in the pension appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1900, exceeding it, I think, by some $14,000. The amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1899 was $141,483,830, and upon the hearing before the committee it appeared that of that sum there had been expended for that fiscal year a little less than $140,000,000, leaving to the credit of the fiscal year 1899 something like a million dollars, which, of course, will remain to the credit of the Bureau for two years from the expiration of that fiscal year, and we are informed that probably the most of it will be needed for sums properly chargeable to the year 1899.

The amount of the appropriations for the fiscal year 1900 was $145,233,830. Up to the present time, or rather, I should say, for the first five months of the fiscal year 1900, the sum of $58,462,085 has been expended, and we are assured by the Commissioner of Pensions that doubtless they will keep within the appropriation.

As I stated, the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1901 is practically the same as the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1900, and the Commissioner tells us that doubtless the amount of the pension roll growing out of the civil war will decrease and be slightly less perhaps for the year 1901 than for the fiscal year 1900; but there will be a considerable increase on account of claims growing out of the Spanish-American war, and he thinks it is wise to make the appropriation for pensions for the coming fiscal year the same as for the fiscal year 1900. The only changes which are in this bill from the bill of last year are for the items of rent and clerk hire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I do not want to ask him one if it breaks the line of his argument.

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly. I yield willingly at the present time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any new legislation in the bill?

Mr. BARNEY. I would say that this bill contains no new legislation, and it contains all the legislation which has been on the pension appropriation bill for years.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask further, how much is appropriated in the bill for the pension of soldiers of the late war—the Spanish-American war?

Mr. BARNEY. That is not segregated and probably ought not to be; but, as before stated, the Pension Commissioner tells us that he anticipates considerable increase on that account, and for that reason asks the same appropriation for the fiscal year 1901 as we gave him for 1900, although he anticipates that the pensions growing out of the civil war will be somewhat decreased.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there any estimate to show the probable amount of those claims?

Mr. BARNEY. Growing out of the Spanish-American war?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. BARNEY. I think not. We are told that there are about 25,000 applications now on file, but necessarily it would be very difficult to estimate what these claims will amount to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was going to ask the gentleman about that.

Mr. CURTIS. Between twenty-four and twenty-five thousand claims.

Mr. BARNEY. I am informed that there are between twenty-four and twenty-five thousand claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. About 25,000 claims growing out of the Spanish-American war. How many applications have been granted or allowed for such pensions?

Mr. BARNEY. Something over 300, we are told.

Mr. McCLEARY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BARNEY. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that my recollection is that the Commissioner of Pensions thought that five or six millions would cover the pensions for the Spanish-American war. There was something like five or six millions less than the hundred and forty-four millions appropriated last year, and he asked for the same, expecting that would be sufficient to cover the claims growing out of the Spanish-American war.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BARNEY. One moment. I think the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken in his statement. The statement of the Commissioner was that for the fiscal year 1899, when only about one hundred and forty-one millions was appropriated, only one hundred and thirty-nine millions plus was required for the payment of pensions for that year, which was about five millions less than is estimated for the fiscal year 1901; but the fiscal year 1900 was the one when one hundred and forty-four millions was appropriated, and the expenditure for the first five months of that year is simply an indication of how much will be needed for the present fiscal year, and the only evidence which at present we can have of that fact.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will permit me, I believe there is one item of new legislation in this bill where additional clerks for agencies is provided for. Am I right?

Mr. BARNEY. Additional clerks are not provided for in terms, but there is an increased sum appropriated for clerks in the pension agencies; but that I do not understand to be what is called new legislation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You do not think that is new legislation?

Mr. BARNEY. I do not think it is, but I propose to explain that a little further on. Now I will listen to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is not true that all the pensions granted widows of the Spanish-American war are not at the same rate as those granted to soldiers or sailors in the war between the States?

Mr. BARNEY. I will say, as I understand it, that what is called the general pension law, the law of 1862 and amendments, places the sailors and soldiers of the Spanish-American war on the same footing as those of the civil war, but that the law of June, 1890, does not apply to soldiers of the Spanish-American war, except that section which relates to dependent parents.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am seeking for information, and as I understand the law a discrimination is made in the pension laws against the soldiers of the Mexican war and the Indian war—they do not get as much for the same disability as the soldiers in the war between the States and the soldiers of the Spanish-American war. Am I not right? Is there not a discrimination against the soldiers of the Mexican war and the soldiers of the Indian war as to the amount or rate paid?

Mr. BARNEY. I did not suppose that was so. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, although I am not thoroughly informed upon that branch of his question, that I only know the act of June, 1890, does not apply to any but soldiers of the civil war, except that section which relates to dependent parents.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to debate the matter, but I hoped we should find in this bill—and that there would be no objection to it—a provision to pension all the soldiers of all the wars alike. I would be very glad if the motion could be made to amend the bill by unanimous consent, so that all the soldiers in all the wars should be pensioned at the same rate.

Mr. BARNEY. The gentleman from Tennessee knows, I may say, better than I do, that an amendment of that kind would be entirely out of order and, if it had been inserted in this bill by the committee, would have been subject to a point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It would be, unless it was admitted by unanimous consent. I concede that.

Mr. BARNEY. And the House seems to be very jealous of the rule to prevent new legislation on general appropriation bills, and I did not feel at liberty, and of course the committee did not, to insert anything of that kind in this bill. In fact, I may say in this connection that it is only the province of this committee to make appropriations for pensions under existing laws and that all amendments to existing pension laws, and, in fact, all new legislation upon that subject, comes properly from another committee, all of which is of course well known to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARNEY. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT. In view of this tremendous increase in the pension list and all that sort of thing, in view of the danger of this great rise in the amount of the appropriation, I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be a good time now for Congress to stop this Friday night business, where they pension deserters, bounty jumpers, and coffee coolers?

I should like to ask him if it would not be an opportune time now to shut off this Friday night business and stop this appealing to Congress from the decisions of the Pension Bureau. I should like to ask him if he does not think that the laws on the statute books are liberal enough now, without supplementing them by the acts which we pass at Friday night sessions, to pension coffee coolers, deserters, and bounty jumpers? I think the time would be very opportune now to shut off that.

Mr. BARNEY. I am not in favor of pensioning actual deserters and bounty jumpers, and I do not think any member on either side of this House is in favor of so doing; neither do I think the present pension laws are as liberal as they ought to be in some particulars.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not say that the gentleman was, and I did not say that anybody was. I asked if it was not a good time to shut off that business.

Mr. HULL. Is not the gentleman in favor of pensioning coffee coolers? I am, because every man in the Army was a coffee cooler. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNEY. When he could get the coffee to cool.

I do not consider the question of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] pertinent, for the reason that in my judgment many, if not all, of the special bills which are considered here on Friday night are as meritorious as any claims growing out of pensions, and I am not in favor of stopping any efforts in doing justice to the soldiers and sailors of this Republic.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BARNEY. Well, I will yield for a question to my friend from Georgia, and then I should like to be allowed to finish my statement.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman with reference to this provision on page 2, the first proviso:

That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose.

I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that all the pensions granted in the Navy are paid out of that fund, which arises from the sale of prizes and things of that sort?

Mr. BARNEY. Well, I do not know what proportion is paid out of that fund. Of course, I understand there is a fund of that kind, and a portion of the Navy pensions are paid from it, but I am not informed as to what proportion. We did not examine the Commissioner of Pensions with reference to that, but I presume likely his report shows it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that for this reason, that if there are any pensions granted to sailors, or to people dependent upon sailors, in this Congress by the passage of any special bills here they, too, will be paid out of that fund, will they not, because of the mere fact that they are pensions either to sailors or to the wives or dependents of sailors? The amounts provided in those bills passed in that way would be paid out of this fund as well, would they not?

Mr. BARNEY. I presume that would be true.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all I want to know.

Mr. BARNEY. Now, with reference to what was said by my colleague from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], regarding the increase of clerks at pension agencies, I would say that for several years, and until the last two years, I think, we had appropriated $430,000 for the payment of clerks at pension agencies; that is, outside of the Pension Bureau in Washington.

But that amount was cut down by the last two appropriations, as I remember, to $415,000. The Pension Commissioner, in the hearing before the subcommittee, urged us strongly to give him the old sum of $430,000; that is, $15,000 additional to what has been given in the last two appropriation bills.

He told us that they were absolutely unable to execute the law with their present force of clerks at the several pension agencies; that they were behind in their work; that at the same time there were many things provided by law that they should do which they were absolutely unable to do, and that our cut of $15,000 was entirely unjustifiable—that he actually needed this appropriation.

I might say that he further added that he would much prefer to have the appropriation for the Pension Bureau in Washington cut down by that amount when the legislative bill came before the committee if we would allow him this $15,000 additional for clerks in pension agencies. In view of that fact, we saw fit to add $15,000 to the estimate, and I think the committee were justified in so doing.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask my colleague as to whether these additional clerks are to come through the classified service or not?

Mr. BARNEY. I understand that they are.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that they do not, from the reading of the latter clause of the section here, which is:

And the salaries paid shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

If they come from the classified service, their salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. BARNEY. I am fully assured, and my own judgment coincides with that, that all of them are in the classified service.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then the Secretary of the Interior can not interfere with their salaries in any manner, form, or shape.

Mr. BARNEY. I suppose he has something to do with their classification, and that is all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Because if they are second, third, or fourth class clerks, the law fixes their salary in the legislative act. I wanted to bring your attention to that clause.

Mr. BARNEY. It is the clause which has usually been placed upon this section of the bill, and I did not suppose it would interfere with the general law relating to the classified service, and I do not believe that it will.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not notice it until just a moment ago, and I only wanted to bring it to the attention of my colleague.

Mr. BARNEY. It is the same law we have always had ever since I have had anything to do with this appropriation bill, and we know that up to this time the clerks at these agencies have been and are on the classified list. Yet I understand this is the legislation that we have always had upon this subject.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow one question for information?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but only ask for information. I wish to know if the gentleman has had occasion to examine, so that he can inform the House, as to whether, in the applications for pension for a like period of service and an equal number of soldiers in the recent Spanish war, the number of applications from one branch of the service exceeds that from the other—that is, whether the applications from the volunteer force or from the Regular Army are in excess?

Mr. BARNEY. I have no information upon that subject. We did not examine the Pension Commissioner with relation to the differences in the number of applications from the Regular Army soldiers or the volunteer soldiers, so I know nothing whatever about it.

Now, the only other change that there is in the bill over the bill of last year is a slight reduction in the payment of rent to pension agencies, growing out of the fact that gradually our pension agencies are getting into public buildings, and, of course, whenever they get into a public building that reduces the amount of rent paid. So the amount in this bill for rent is a few thousand dollars less than in the last bill.

I think, Mr. Chairman, unless some other gentlemen desire to ask questions, that that is all I desire to say at the present time, and I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Suppose you take up an hour on that side and then give me an hour.

Mr. BARNEY. I do not believe we will want that much time on this side, but I will see. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. McCALL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield first, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and then the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] may be recognized.

Mr. McCALL. I simply wish to ask the gentleman how much the estimates show will be required to pay the pensions growing out of the Spanish war for the ensuing year?

Mr. BARNEY. As I have said in answer to several interrogatories upon that subject, it is absolutely impossible to make an estimate.

I stated that at the present time there were 25,000 applications; that something like 300 of them have already been allowed; and anticipating more applications, and anticipating the granting of many of these applications that are pending, I may say that we have added four or five million dollars to what otherwise would probably have been appropriated; but the Pension Commissioner says that it will probably not take that amount or near that amount. For safety, however, we have done so.

Now I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, in 1893, from some unknown source, perhaps from ignorance, likely from malice, but most probably from a desire to show zeal, no matter at whose expense, that startling, false, and fictitious charge was originated that thousands of fraudulent pensioners were on our roll. Soon after the advent of the Administration which installed Mr. Lochren as Commissioner pensioners were dropped and pensions reduced by the thousands, and that, too, without notice or opportunity to be heard.

In order to sustain this arbitrary and biased action on the part of the Pension Bureau, Mr. Cleveland, in his message of December 4, 1893, used the following language:

Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments in the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds.

That charge was most unfair and unjust to thousands of brave men who showed their love of this country by offering it their lives. It was not only false, but a slander against thousands of patriotic veterans who made part and parcel of the grandest army that ever marched to drumbeat or willingly answered the bugle's call. Coming, as it did, from the Executive head of the nation, and coming to us soon after the dropping of so many pensioners and the reducing of so many pensions, it naturally attracted the attention of the public to those men; and in many cases the epithet "fraud" was applied to one who had worn the blue and had suffered on the battlefield, on the march, or in prison pens.

An investigation proved the falsity of these charges, and it showed that, instead of the pensioners of this country being frauds, they had been robbed by the officers of this great, rich, and opulent Government of their little pensions, and that, too, without opportunity to be heard and without notice. So unfair was the action of the Commissioner of Pensions that on the 21st day of December, 1893, Congress passed a law forbidding the dropping, the reducing, or the withholding of pensions without first giving thirty days' notice, and provided that all pensions should be deemed and held by the officers of this Government to be vested rights. But the dropping of pensions continued. The board of revision, which had been established, continued its work. But members of Congress, by reason of the reports of the local medical examining boards and the evidence on file, and with the assistance of Deputy Pension Commissioner Murphy, who was a friend of the soldier, were able to have many of them restored.

However, in order to shut out members of Congress, and to prevent them from ascertaining whether or not injustice had been done the old soldiers, instructions were issued to the various pension examining boards of this country that they should no longer rate the pensioners they examined. The conduct of the Pension Bureau was so outrageous, the object was so apparent, that on the 2d day of March, 1895, Congress passed a law requiring the various local pension boards to rate those they examined. In 1893, in 1894, and in 1895 pensioners were dropped, pensions were reduced, and pension claims were rejected by thousands, and the old soldiers became disheartened and discouraged. They would not urge their claims, because to ask action was to invite rejection. Just to show how much—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman to say that in 1893 pensioners were dropped by the thousand?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky (continuing). And pensions were reduced by the thousand?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know how it is that the table given in this report shows a steady increase of pensioners and also in the amount of pensions.

Mr. CURTIS. That is shown by the allowance. But no man who knows anything about pension matters will deny for a minute that your people unjustly and unfairly reduced pensioners; and he will not deny that we compelled them to restore them to the roll, because the evidence showed that an outrage had been perpetrated.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Can not you answer my question?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Who was the Commissioner of Pensions at the time you say these men were reduced?

Mr. CURTIS. Commissioner Lochren.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Was not he an ex-Union soldier?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, he was; but his acts demonstrated that he was not a friend of the Union soldier.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will you answer an additional question?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You have stated that your people compelled our people to restore these pensioners.

Mr. CURTIS. I say we compelled your Commissioner, after he had dropped them, to restore many of them to the roll, and the present Commissioner has restored a number.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Why, then, is it that in 1897 the number of pensioners on the roll does not very much exceed those on the roll in 1893, if, as you state, you have compelled the Commissioner to restore a large number that were dropped?

Mr. CURTIS. You know that there are a great many thousand pension claims pending. There have been some claims allowed; there have been some rejected, and your people dropped a great many.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In 1893 there were 966,000 pensioners on the roll. Now, you say that a large number of them were dropped by Commissioner Lochren?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, in 1897 there were 976,000 on the roll, a difference of 10,000 under your own people, when you say that Commissioner Lochren had been compelled to restore many.

Mr. CURTIS. He had to continue in business, did he not?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There were just 10,000 more than were on the roll in 1893. Now, will you explain how it is that 10,000 covers more than the normal increase? If these men have been restored, why does not the roll of 1897 show a greater increase than 10,000?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know; but no man who has examined the records of the office will deny for a single minute that they were reduced, and you must remember that at this late date after the war the pensioners are dying by thousands. They die at the rate of 30,000 a year. Now, let me tell you what the board did in 1895. I have the figures taken from the report. In 1895 the board of revision, in round numbers, examined 104,000 cases; they dropped 4,000; they restored 2,000 to the old roll; they reduced 20,000, and they called for evidence in 77,000 cases. Is it not strange that that board should find something wrong, something of error, in every case that they examined?

The rejection, the reduction, and the withholding of pensions was so unfair that on the 6th day of March, 1896, Congress passed a law fixing the date for the commencement of pensions, and it provided that where pensions had been reduced or rejected or withheld, upon the filing of a new application and the allowance of the claim, the payment should date from the filing of the first application if the evidence showed a pensionable disability at the date of first filing.

In order to sustain the charges against the pensioners, the various special examiners and clerks detailed to that work were sent to different parts of this country for the purpose of unearthing pension frauds. The vast increase in the appropriation will show the efforts that were made, and the small number of indictments found and the few convictions had will show how groundless the charges were.

Why, in 1893 there was appropriated for the special examining division, $225,000; in 1894 there was used in that division $400,000; in 1895, $450,000; in 1896, $497,000; in 1898, $431,000; in 1899, $389,000; and yet, gentlemen, with nearly a million pensioners on the roll, with 50,000 attorneys practicing before the Department, with five to ten witnesses in each case, with thousands of men before whom testimony has been taken, there were only 963 indictments found in the three years of 1894, 1895, and 1896 and only 596 convictions had. Do these figures show that thousands of neighborhoods had fraudulent pensioners? No, but they do show that the pension roll of this country is one grand, sublime roll of honor.

The very fact that nearly all the pensioners who were dropped have since been restored to the roll is evidence that the charges were false in the first place. Now, another thing. In 1896 many thousand dollars were spent by the special examining division of the Pension Bureau. The Commissioner tells us that by and through the efforts of the special examining division and the law division there was recovered to the United States, in round numbers, $20,000. Mark you, there was an increase in the expense of the special examining division over 1893 of over $270,000. He does not tell us the amount expended by the law division, nor does he tell us what it cost the Department of Justice. It seems to me that comment is unnecessary.

On the 4th of March, 1897, there was a change of Administration, and the soldiers of this country looked forward to a new Commissioner of Pensions and a change in the Bureau of Pensions. They looked for a change in the rules and regulations; they looked for a more liberal construction of the law, but I am sorry to say, they were disappointed. The Republican party has always been and still is the friend of the old soldier. But the new Commissioner of Pensions, with the exception of the continuance of the board of revision, which I believe had completed its work, and the consequent stoppage of the reduction and dropping of pensioners, continued the same rules and practices as the former Administration. He kept up the same false charges against the pensioners. He permitted himself to be interviewed and wrote articles for the press and did other things to attract the attention of the public to his Bureau.

I ask you if the figures contained in his own report sustain the charges against the pensioners? Why, in the three years 1897, 1898, and 1899, with the large number of pensioners on the roll, as I have heretofore stated, with 50,000 attorneys practicing before the Department, with the great number of witnesses and the large number of officers in these years, there were only 750 indictments and only 437 convictions had! There were only 29 attorneys disbarred in 1898 and only 63 in 1899.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman think they ought to be discharged?

Mr. CURTIS. I do, if they did not obey the law. I give these figures to show how groundless the charges were. There was nothing tangible and nothing real in the charges that were made and are being made to-day against the pensioners of this country.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not against the gentleman, but were not some of these charges made by the Commissioner of Pensions himself?

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I have been saying.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that. Now, may I ask—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Oh, let him go on.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that the gentleman have as much time as he wants.

Mr. BARNEY. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas desire?

Mr. CURTIS. Ten minutes.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, if this is true, and I have no doubt it is, is not the remedy of it in the hands of the Administration? The Grand Army of the Republic has refused to indorse Mr. Evans, and the President, either expressly or by permitting him to remain, does indorse him.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not believe the President does indorse him. I do not believe the President knows what is going on in that office.

Mr. GAINES. Why does he not have the courage to condemn him?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not agree with you that the President can go down into details and examine each and every case.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say that.

Mr. CURTIS. The Commissioner says his policy is all right. If you will allow me, I will touch upon that. I do not believe the President of the United States is sustaining the Commissioner of Pensions, or that he would if he knew the truth, because he is a soldier himself, and he is the soldier's friend.

Mr. GAINES. Have you asked the President to condemn him?

Mr. CURTIS. I have talked with the President, and the President said that he would look into the charges that are made.

Mr. GAINES. Have you been back to see whether he has done so?

Mr. CURTIS. He has not had time.

Mr. GAINES. Have you been dilatory about it?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I have gone to other officers and talked with them about this matter.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will allow me, was not the present Commissioner of Pensions also a soldier in the Union Army?

Mr. CURTIS. They say he was a soldier; but I understand he did not serve very long. I am not advised of his service.

Mr. SIMS. Like most of the pensioners, I suppose.

Mr. CURTIS. You do not dare say that about the pensioners.

Mr. SIMS. I say that about some of them.

Mr. CURTIS. The pensioners were honest and faithful men, who served their country long and well, and you know it, or ought to know it.

Mr. SIMS. Some of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to state right there a matter which I think the country will be interested in? Henry Clay Evans was a soldier. He was born in the State of Pennsylvania, and when I first knew him he was a private soldier in a Wisconsin regiment. He came to Chattanooga and joined the Army of the Cumberland. How long he served I do not undertake to say, but that he was a soldier—an enlisted man—and did serve is a fact. After his term of service, near the close of the war, he was a clerk in the quartermaster's department at Chattanooga, where he made his home finally and where he lives now.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, I want to say that the same kind of charges were made while Mr. Raum was Commissioner of Pensions, and I want to call your attention to what he said in a letter that was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He said: "I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that a very small percentage of the cases allowed consist of fraudulent and unjust claims." He says, further, in regard to what the newspapers were charging: "They have charged frauds right and left, without a case before them upon which to found their charges." And that is true to-day, and true of the charges that are being made against the men upon the pension roll of this country. There is no foundation for them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the fault is in the pension laws, with the exception of one or two in regard to widows, and perhaps the law of 1890 should be more explicit, so it could not be misconstrued. I believe the trouble is with the rules and the regulations and the constructions placed upon those laws by the officers in charge. It is openly charged that the act of March 6, 1896, has been and still is being ignored. The Commissioner of Pensions tells us that he does not give the soldiers the benefit of the ratings of the local boards, notwithstanding the act of March 2, 1895, and notwithstanding the fact that it is included in this bill that the local pension board shall rate the pensioners. If the law requires the pensioners to be rated, then why not give them the benefit of that rating?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the hearings on page 7?

Mr. CURTIS. I will get to that in a minute.

Mr. SIMS. Then you charge that the Commissioner is not acting honestly in discharging the law as he finds it?

Mr. CURTIS. I will get to that part after a while. I have to say that I believe the policy pursued by the Commissioner of Pensions is not just to the old soldier.

Mr. SIMS. Your charge is that the law is all right and the Commissioner is wrong?

Mr. CURTIS. With few exceptions, I say the law is all right now. The Commissioner of Pensions said that he does combine disabilities, but if any member of Congress will take the time to examine the cases which I have, which have been rejected, he will find that the Commissioner does not always do so, and if this letter from him, published in the National Tribune, the great soldier paper of the country, on the 28th of December, 1899, is true, he does not do it. Listen: "There is no warrant in the act of June 27, 1890, for an 'aggregate' of disabilities; * * * consequently the rejection of your claim is affirmed." That letter was dated December 16 and signed by the Commissioner himself, and published in this paper on December 28.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do you claim that the rating of the local pension board should be final?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; but I do claim that where the local pension board rates a pensioner and gives him a ratable disability, he should be given the benefit of that rating; and if it does not give him a ratable disability, it ought to be ignored.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Can it be made conclusive under the law?

Mr. CURTIS. I think the law is sufficient. It is simply a question of construction in the office of the Commissioner.

Mr. RAY of New York. One moment now. Is the gentleman correct in that, that it is a question of construction in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. CURTIS. He says so himself.

Mr. RAY of New York. Has it not gone up to the Interior Department repeatedly, and has not the Interior Department decided over and over again that under the law as it stands they must so hold, and is not the Commissioner of Pensions simply following up the construction that is given by a higher construction than himself?

Mr. CURTIS. That is what the Commissioner claims; but if you will examine these cases, you will find that he does not.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, the gentleman ought not to say that.

Mr. CURTIS. I said it because I have examined the cases; and if you want me to put them into the RECORD, I can do so.

Mr. RAY of New York. You had better, if you make any such claim.

Mr. CURTIS. Let him deny it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CURTIS. Why, certainly, if my time is extended; but I want to finish up what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like ten minutes more.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I do not think you are just.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to be.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not think you are just in your remarks concerning the Commissioner of Pensions in regard to that ruling, because any decision made by the Commissioner on a question of law or the interpretation of the pension laws is always subject to appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, and Webster Davis is a very competent man.

Mr. CURTIS. And he has reversed the Commissioner often.

Mr. RAY of New York. And he has repeatedly reaffirmed this doctrine of which you are complaining, and alleges that that is the law. Now, if the gentleman will look a little further, he will find that a bill to amend and correct the pension law in that regard has been introduced in the Senate and has passed that body.

Mr. CURTIS. And ought to pass this House, so that the Commissioner of Pensions can not misconstrue it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Very good; then you ought not to charge against the Commissioner of Pensions that which has been affirmed by a higher authority, and a bill is now pending to correct it.

Mr. CURTIS. I charge it because I have examined the cases; I have a memorandum of them in my pocket, cases where I believe he has absolutely ignored the decision of Webster Davis. I want to call your attention to the fact that in 1897 he says he rejected, in round numbers, 107,000 cases—89,000 on medical grounds, 13,000 on legal grounds, 5,000 on the ground of no benefit. I charge openly that if in these rejected cases the benefit of the ratings had been given to the pensioner a large number would have been allowed. I have no feeling against the Commissioner of Pensions; he has always treated me nicely; my calls have been promptly answered; my suggestions have been given consideration, if not always favorable; but I have examined these cases, and I am of the opinion—and that opinion is based upon my examination of these cases—that his policy is against the interest of the old soldiers and that they are not receiving fair treatment at his hands.

Now, why were pension laws enacted? The answer is simply, because the Government owed a debt to the soldiers it could not pay; because they did their duty to this country when it needed defenders, when loyalty and patriotism were put to the test. But the Commissioner of Pensions tells us that there have been $2,000,000,000 paid to the soldiers since 1866. Why, gentlemen, in 1861 this Government needed men and money. Loyal, patriotic men answered the call of the Government, and loyal men loaned their money to the Government. There has been paid back to those who loaned the money over $5,000,000,000. Yet the Commissioner of Pensions says nothing about that. They loaned their money and accepted the bonds of the country. The money and the interest should have been returned, as it has been; but I submit it is unfair to parade before the public the amount of money paid to the pensioners in order to justify those who were in charge of that almost sacred fund in their technical construction of the laws.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask if the difficulty about which you complain may not appropriately be charged to the fact that men entirely out of sympathy with the old soldier have been kept upon the board of review in the Pension Office under the civil-service laws of the Government and against the interest of the old veterans?

Mr. CURTIS. I have been told that that was true; but the Commissioner of Pensions has the right, he has the power to change any man that is on the board of review and send him to some other division.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, certainly; but that only shifts the force and retains the unsympathetic employee. The soldier did not stand on a technicality when he took up arms for his country. Why should the Government now? I would give him the benefit of liberal construction of law.

Mr. McDOWELL. I will ask the gentleman, has not the Commissioner authority to overrule the decisions of the board if he thinks they are not just?

Mr. CURTIS. I think so. I say, yes.

Mr. McDOWELL. Do you think the rulings of Webster Davis are any more in the interest of the old soldier than those of the Commissioner?

Mr. CURTIS. I know the decisions of Webster Davis are in the interest of the old soldiers, and all they ask is fair treatment; and if the law be administered as laid down by Webster Davis they would be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. McDOWELL. Why, then, does it take so long to have these cases disposed of that are carried there on appeal?

Mr. CURTIS. Because there are so many of them. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that this war cost this Government a great amount of money; but when we figure that we must not forget the price that was ungrudgingly paid by the old soldiers and their families. It was paid in crimson currency, in broken hearts, and bitter tears. It was paid and is still being paid in aches and pains, the result of wounds received and diseases contracted in the service.

Those men who sneer at the pensioners must know nothing of the hardships of the march and battle; they must never have read of Andersonville and Libby—those pens of filth, disease, and death—names to be conjured with only in the chamber of horrors. Now, why should the old soldier, who was examined, who was accepted, and who served his country long and well, be compelled to prove that he was sound when he enlisted? Why should the old soldier who served his country and has proved that he was wounded in the service or contracted disease in the service or was injured in the service and shows that he is still suffering from those disabilities, and the medical evidence shows that they are of long standing, be compelled to prove their continuance each and every year? Why should the old soldier who was wounded or injured in the service and is still suffering be compelled to prove the continuance of the disabilities which his neighbors could not know of unless he made an exhibition of himself?

Why should the ironclad property rule be applied to widows? Why this delay in granting widows' pensions under the old law? Why not give all widows entitled to pensions $12? Why not do justice to these women? Why wait and delay action in their cases under the old law until they have been laid beside the old soldier and the debt the Government owes is laid up in a pigeonhole to be brought up in the time of some future special examiner? Why not, and in this I conclude, give to the old soldiers fair treatment? Justice is all they ask; liberally construe the laws that are now upon the statute books, and the soldiers and the soldiers' friends will be satisfied. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I deem this the proper time and place to call to the attention of the House that which concerns thousands of people in the country, and intimately concerns every member of this body. I desire to register a protest as vigorously as the justice of the case demands, and within my humble power, against the delay in the interpretation of the well-established law of this country on the subject of granting pensions. We find a situation prevailing now on the subject of the right of those under the law to pension who were under 16 years of age upon the death of the pensioner—the soldier who was entitled—and yet when his children applied and when their pension cases were before the Pension Commissioner he rendered a decision against the plain law, I believe, and unfavorable to that class of applicants.

Briefly, the law reads as follows:

SEC. 4702. If any person embraced within the provisions of sections 4692 and 4693 has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or hereafter dies by reason of any wound, injury, or disease, which, under the conditions and limitations of such sections, would have entitled him to an invalid pension had he been disabled, his widow, or if there be no widow, or in case of her death without payment to her of any part of the pension hereinafter mentioned, his child or children under 16 years of age, shall be entitled to receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of the husband or father, to continue to the widow during her widowhood, and to his child or children until they severally attain the age of 16 years, and no longer; and if the widow remarry, the child or children shall be entitled from the date of remarriage.

That law gave those who were under 16 years of age a pension, and under its enforcement for years and years they were granted a pension, though applied for after they arrived at 16. Now, a decision of the Pension Commissioner on this subject was long ago made, and on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, where it has laid for over a year, the Commissioner's decision was overruled, and by another process of delay it went to the Attorney-General. There is not a member in this House but who has received letter after letter, month after month, asking for justice at the hands of the Government under this law, and asking for a decision of this plain proposition.

And yet, by reason of the policy of procrastination and delay that everywhere pervades the Department on the subject of pensions, these children and those who were children then are not granted a pension and can not get a decision. Why? The point presented is this: Children under 16 years of age, though confessedly entitled to a pension had they applied before that age, would have received it, but now these children, under guardian then, these children in charitable institutions, public and private, while they were under 16 years of age, those who were the beneficiaries of charitable people all over the country, children of soldiers under this law entitled to pensions, are to have the statute of limitations, some imaginary statute or bar, set up against them because they did not apply before they arrived at the age of 16.

That is the proposition confronting us by the Bureau's delay in the enforcement of this law—in the delay in deciding. Why not make a decision; why hold up these claims; why present to this country a cowardice upon the subject of interpretation of what seems to me to be a plain proposition of law? I want to warn the members of this body, every one of whom is interested in this subject, that the codification proposed, the compilation of law proposed by Congress, is aimed at striking out these just cases.

This compilation of law is aimed at striking out these just cases for pension, and I warn you so, that you may be on guard.

So I protest against this delay in the interpretation of law, to say nothing at this time about the delay in the taking up and considering the pension applications of the Spanish-American soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have entered into an agreement with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] that the general debate shall continue until 4 o'clock, and then the five-minute debate continue until half past 4, at which time the committee will rise and the vote be taken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I see no objection to that on our side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that general debate on this bill shall expire at 4 o'clock, when the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule until half past 4, at which time a motion for the committee to rise shall prevail. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is satisfactory, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DALY].

[Mr. DALY of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, taking advantage of the temporary rule allowing general debate, I shall discuss the power of Congress to say what shall and what shall not be transmitted in the United States mails, claiming as I do that Congress can and should stop trusts, combines, monopolies, and their allies from using the mails in transmitting any and all their correspondence. The power of Congress is unquestionable to pass and enforce such a law, and Congress has done so in similar cases, and the necessity for the vigorous exercise of that power along this line is at hand.

But I will stop for a moment to say this on this pension bill now pending: Our pensioners and disbursements in 1899 were less than in 1898, but when we remember that the civil war closed thirty-five years ago, and that even though the responsibilities were less in 1899 than in 1898, showing some reform, our pensioners and disbursements were, nevertheless, four times greater in 1899 than in 1879, twenty years ago. We can not blame the people who welcome this reform for wondering why this roll has not been reduced more.

The official figures of the committee reporting this bill are as follows:

Fiscal year.	Number of pensioners on the roll.	Annual value of pensions.	Disbursements on account of pensions.	Total number of applications filed.	Total number of claims allowed.
1879.....	242,755	$25,493,742.15	$33,664,428.02	57,118	31,346
1898.....	963,714	130,968,465.00	144,651,879.80	37,524	52,648
1899.....	991,519	131,617,961.00	138,355,052.95	48,765	37,077

I shall continue to sustain the Commissioner of Pensions as long as he keeps up this work, believing as I do that he has tried to do his duty as he sees it, and that, too, in the face of many opposing members of his party and the Grand Army of the Republic. This clash of itself casts suspicion on our pension roll. It should be reformed until it is placed above suspicion—made, as my people would have it, a veritable roll of honor. The Southern people favor just pension laws, rightfully administered.

But, Mr. Chairman, I shall now take up my subject—trusts and their allies, and the power and propriety of Congress denying them the use of the mails in the transaction of their business. Without the use of the mails, clearly they would be powerless to survive, as was the Louisiana lottery, and that, too, after the supreme court of that State and of the United States said that under the constitution of Louisiana that lottery had the right to exist. But Congress said that they should no longer use the mail for the transaction of their business, and straightway strangled that institution to death in this country, and forced it to go, as it did, to Honduras, where it undertook to carry on its business from that place in the United States; but its correspondence was soon, by another statute, denied the privilege of the mail service, which finally drove that nefarious business from the land. So we see how far-reaching and destructive it is to deny the use of the mail, even to a great moneyed institution which the court said had the right under the fundamental law of Louisiana to exist.

If something is not done, and at once, to crush the trusts and other combines, we will have in this country another roll of pensioners filling the almshouses of the cities, counties, and States of the Union, and invincible corruptionists will continue to prowl around the precincts of legislation, State and national, until they shall dominate the courts of justice, the last resort of the people short of open rebellion.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in repeated and unanimous opinions, have held, and it is now the law, that Congress, under the constitutional grant of power "to establish post-offices and post-roads," has the sole power to say what shall and what shall not be carried in the mails, and that, too, regardless of whether the thing admitted or excluded is immoral in itself, because Congress is not required to furnish mailing facilities for "every purpose," says Chief Justice Fuller in the case of Rapier (143 U. S., 133), who was convicted of violating the anti lottery statute passed by Congress; or as was said by Justice Field in the early and like case of Jackson, reported in 96 U. S., page 727:

The power possessed by Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded.

Both of these opinions have been repeatedly reaffirmed, the Rapier case being referred to as settling the constitutionality of the lottery law in the two Horner cases, reported in 143 U. S., at pages 213 and 578. The court fully approved the Jackson case in the Rapier case, the court holding in both that Congress has the power to exclude what it pleases from the mails, whether moral or immoral.

Chief Justice Fuller, in the Rapier case, continued:

It is not necessary that Congress should have the power to deal with crime or immorality within States in order to maintain that it possesses the power to forbid the use of the mails in aid of the perpetration of crime or immorality.

The court had already said, I may add, that while the mailing facilities were for the benefit of the people, Congress was not required to furnish such service for "every purpose."

Judge Fuller continued:

The question to be determined relates to the constitutionality of section 3894 of the Revised Statutes as amended by that act. In ex parte Jackson (96 U. S. 727) it was held that the power vested in Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads embraced the regulation of the entire postal system of the country, and that under it Congress may designate what may be carried in the mails and what excluded; that in excluding various articles from the mails the object of Congress is not to interfere with the freedom of the press or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse the facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious by Congress to the public morals.

Congress is not obliged to furnish mail facilities for "every purpose." I will show in a few moments this is true in practice. I shall show what matters are nonmailable. Continuing, Chief Justice Fuller, in the Rapier case, says:

The States, before the Union was formed, could furnish post-offices and post-roads, and in doing so could bring into place the police power in the protection of their citizens from the use of the means so provided for purposes supposed to exert a demoralizing influence upon the people. When the power to establish post-offices and post-roads was surrendered to the Congress, it was a complete power, and the grant carried with it the right to exercise all the powers which made that power effective. It is not necessary that Congress should have the power to deal with crime or immorality within the States in order to maintain that it possesses the power to forbid the use of the mail in the perpetration of crime or immorality.

The argument that there is a distinction between mala prohibita and mala in se and that Congress might forbid the use of the mails in promotion of such acts as are universally regarded as mala in se, including all such crimes as murder, arson, burglary, etc., and the offense of circulating obscene books and papers, but can not do so in respect of other matters, which it might regard as criminal or immoral, but which it has no power itself to prohibit, involves a concession which is fatal to the contention of petitioner, since it would be for Congress to determine what are within and what are without the rules; but we think there is no room for such a distinction here and that it must be left to Congress in the exercise of its sound discretion to determine in what manner it will exercise the power it undoubtedly possesses.

The freedom of communication is not abridged within the intent and meaning of the constitutional provision unless Congress is absolutely destitute of any discretion as to what shall or shall not be carried in the mails and compelled arbitrarily to assist in the dissemination of matters condemned by its judgment, through the governmental agencies which it controls. That power may be abused furnishes no ground for a denial of its existence, if government is to be maintained at all. In short, we do not find sufficient grounds in the argument of counsel, able and exhaustive as they have been, to induce us to change the views already expressed in the Jackson case, to which we have referred. We adhere to the conclusion therein announced.

Unless this great court overrules these and fifty or more similar opinions on the subject, holding the various laws on this subject are valid, then the constitutionality of the bill I have introduced is "unquestionable." I will now read the bill, as follows:

A bill further regulating the class of matter denied admission to the mail.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no letter, postal card, or circular that relates to or is designed to promote the affairs of, and no check, draft, bill, note, money, postal note, or money order drawn by or to, or issued or drawn to conduct the business or affairs of, any firm, association, company, or corporation, or two or more persons dealing in or manufacturing or producing any growth, product, commodity, or article of commerce or trade, shall be carried in the mail or received or delivered at any post-office or branch or station thereof, or by any letter carrier, when such firm, association, company, corporation, or persons are associated or combined for any or either or all of the following purposes:

First. To abolish, abridge, or in any wise affect open and free competition in trade, or exclude rivalry between the parties thereto, or to abridge or attempt to abridge competition between others not parties thereto, or themselves and others, engaged in like or other business.

Second. To create or promote any restrictions in trade or commerce or to limit or restrict production of any article or commodity of trade unduly to affect the market.

Third. To affect the wages of employees of themselves or others or diminish the opportunities of wage-earners by contracting production, abridging competition, or otherwise.

Fourth. To diminish the product of labor and skill in order to increase the price thereof.

Fifth. To create monopoly or do that which tends thereto.

Sixth. To control the market or to limit or abridge the opportunities of the public as to supply, price, or quality of commodities or products, or by partitioning territory in which to operate between the parties thereto, or otherwise limiting the operations of either or all, so as to limit production or competition or prices.

Seventh. To arbitrarily set a minimum price so as to exclude competition between themselves, or to pool prices or profits, or prorate orders.

Eighth. To boycott others engaged in like business or any business, or to seek by other means than fair and open rivalry in trade to undermine competition, or to force or seek to force dealers to handle their commodities or products solely.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall deposit or cause to be deposited, or who shall knowingly send or cause to be sent, anything to be conveyed or delivered by mail in violation of this act, or who shall cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be fined not less than $5,000 and imprisoned not less than one year for each offense. Proceeding may be instituted by information or indictment, and trial had either in the district in which the unlawful matter was mailed or in that in which it was designed to be delivered.

SEC. 3. That grand juries shall have inquisitorial powers to inquire into violations of this act and any citizen shall be permitted to testify thereto of his own volition, and if no person offers himself as prosecutor in any case juries shall make return of such bill of indictment into court, if found, and the court shall order the name of the district attorney entered thereon as prosecutor ex officio.

SEC. 4. That any person who informs upon and successfully prosecutes any violator of this act shall be awarded by the trial judge one-half of the amount of the fine imposed and collected, out of which the court may fix and allot his attorney's fee.

SEC. 5. That judges of courts shall deliver this act in special charge to grand juries at each term.

I want to say that I take no special pride in the fact that it is my bill. You may call it anybody's bill you please. What I want is to save my countrymen and save my people from being outraged, from being deprived of their natural rights and the right of free trade between the States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GAINES. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield me ten minutes more.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield the gentleman ten minutes of my time.

Mr. GAINES. I am very grateful to the gentleman. A fair-minded man never loses anything in dealing fairly with another man who is trying to deal fairly, whether he is doing so or not. I have a letter indorsing this bill from the distinguished attorney-general of Ohio, Mr. F. S. Monnet, who has given the trust question long and distinguished attention. I have not time to read it, but will insert it in the RECORD by permission:

I am delighted to know that you have introduced a bill with penal features to reach trusts through the powers vested in Congress in Article I, section 8, providing for the establishment of post-offices and post-roads, or bring it under the mail department. This relieves us of the State's sovereignty objection made to Congress, interfering with State commerce by attempting to reach the commerce clause through section 8. Inasmuch as the court sustained this class of legislation in lotteries, I think you are producing one of the most effectual lines to reach trusts and monopolies that can not be reached through the commerce clause. I would feel complimented if you would have your clerk send me your proposed bill.

Congress controls the local or State as well as interstate mails, while under the interstate-commerce clause Congress is confined to the regulation of interstate and international commerce pure and simple. Hence this bill as a law would crush local or State trust commerce and interstate trust commerce, and do so equally all over the United States. It would be necessarily uniform in legal if not practical effect. These are strong points in favor of the policy of this bill.

Section 1 says if certain concerns or persons "are associated or combined for any one or either or all of the following purposes," naming them, and in addition have used the mail to transact their business, the Federal grand jury finds a true bill and enforces the law against them, as in any other criminal case.

Section 3 gives the right to the humblest man in this land to go before the grand jury, and gives the jury the right to summon him before the grand jury, for the purpose of finding a true bill against the violator of this statute.

One of the weaknesses of the present anti-trust law, Mr. Chairman, is that it puts it entirely in the hands of the Attorney-General of the United States to say when suits shall be filed against trusts. By my bill I put it in the hands of the people of this country to say when it shall operate. They are the ones who suffer. They are the victims. I put it in the hands of the plain people of this country—our Federal grand jurors—I put it in the hands of the Attorney-General and the Federal judge in the district where the trust is, and the people can go before the grand jury and say, "Here is A. B. & Co., a trust." They find whether it is or not a trust formed for any one, either, or all the purposes named in section 1; and if they find it is a trust, they ask, "Did it send its letters through the mail?"

If the grand jury find that it has done so, they find a true bill, and then they go before a jury of the country, a jury of their peers, and there the case is tried. If they find that it is a trust formed for any one, either, or all the purposes named and that it used the mail in transacting its business, it is found guilty and fined $5,000 or imprisoned one year. I am tired of this one-man Government; I am tired of the Attorney-General of the United States—I do not care whether he is Mr. Olney or Mr. Griggs, I do not care whether he is that greatest of patriots, William Jennings Bryan; if Attorney-General, I would oppose putting it in his hands exclusively—to say whether or not the trust shall be prosecuted or arraigned by the injunctive process in the courts.

Sir, there has never yet been a remedy for the trust evil suggested that its apologists did not pick a flaw in it. They masquerade as friends of the people and are heard exclaiming, "Trusts are a bad lot, but this is not the way to get at them." Any way is the wrong way. The great nullifying defect in the law of 1890 was doubtless injected into it by the friends of the trust for the exact purpose it has served—to nullify the act. It leaves its execution and the institution of actions solely to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General does not see proper to do it, and so there you are. It is a dead letter, utterly and absolutely useless and of no avail, because its execution rests with one man who does not see proper to enforce it.

My bill addresses itself specifically to this great defect. I have seen this bill criticised for that, it was said, it throws upon postmasters and carriers the onus of determining what is a trust, and I admit the criticism would be fatal if it were well founded; but nowhere in the bill is such duty imposed. On the other hand, the inhibitions, penalties, and maledictions of the bill are all leveled at the person who misuses the mail, and postmasters are not commanded to throw out or refuse mail until the fact that it is sent by a trust is established by the court. Its mandates are addressed to courts and juries and not to postmasters.

The Federal judges are required to give it in special charge to the grand juries, and the juries are given inquisitorial power to ferret them out, and the doors of jury rooms are set ajar to citizens to lodge complaints, whomsoever will, and thus the path is so open and easy and straight to conviction that no trust or person will dare to take the risk. It eliminates this one-man power. It relegates the enforcement of it back to the people themselves, where it rightfully belongs.

The bill enforces itself by its terrors and the ease and certainty with which they may be invoked by bringing the courts into use, and by the invitations it extends to citizens to cooperate with the courts, and the power it confers upon grand juries to ferret out and compel information. Our entire system of criminal jurisprudence rests upon the probity and effectiveness of the grand jury. It stands between the people and the lawbreaker with drawn sword, the guardian of the one and the terror of the other; it is hoary with age, and is the wisest and surest and most effective of all the instrumentalities designed for the protection of society and the suppression of vice, and this bill predicates itself in the impregnable and unimpugnable strength and wisdom of this old-time grand-jury system that has never failed in any other branch of crime to fully meet the exigencies and demands of the case.

It sends this monster evil back to this source of all power and rectifier of wrongs to be weighed in the balances. It removes it beyond the power of any one man, or administration, or party, or politicians with pulls to protect an evil that saps the public welfare. It sends these giant trusts back to answer for their deed to the people, in their own sacred forum, where all violations of law, great and small, must answer; and if this bill is wrong in doing this, then the whole jury system is wrong, although the wisdom of ages has approved and perfected it, and it has never failed before. I maintain that it is right and just and lawful and equitable to compel these trusts to be measured by this same standard that is set up for all transgressors, and I am assured that it can not harm them if they are innocent, because it is the common people who are measuring them, and they may be depended upon to mete out exact justice, and of this no man or combination of men can complain.

In proof of my statement that Congress has the right to say what may and what shall not be carried in the mails, and that, too, regardless of whether the matter denied or admitted is moral or immoral, I cite certain acts which are declared by Congress to be "offenses against the postal service," as follows:

1. Combination to prevent bids to carry the mails. Acts of 1876.
2. The use of the mails to promote frauds. Acts of 1880.
3. Fraudulently assuming fictitious addresses. Acts of 1889.
4. Libelous, indecent, scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening envelopes and wrappers are made nonmailable. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3893.)
5. Obscene and like matter are made "nonmailable."—Id.
6. Lotteries, gift enterprises, etc., their circulars, etc., are made "nonmailable." (Rev. Stat., sec. 3893.)
7. Bringing lottery tickets into the United States is made a crime and prohibited. (Acts 1893.)
8. Postmasters are not allowed to be lottery agents. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3851.)

We have, then, clearly seen that the court of last resort has held that the power is in Congress to say what shall and what shall not be carried in the mails, and that, too, regardless of whether the matter denied or given this privilege is moral per se or not, and until Congress shall reverse this it is clearly in its power to enact laws similar to the one that I propose.

But even if Congress were confined to excluding only such things as are immoral per se, I contend that trusts are immoral; that they are contrary to the public policy, to the common law, in derogation of the general welfare, and that Congress, in the act of 1890, and many of the States have so declared.

I see no difference in a concern which corrupts one's morals in the common acceptance of the term and a concern that deprives the individual of his natural means of making a living, and therefore gradually deprives him of life.

We are all God's creatures, and each of us has the right to live, and having the right to live we must have the further right to exercise our natural rights to make a living, and anyone who deprives us, however small or great, of the means of exercising this natural right of making a living directly deprives us of the right to maintain life. The welfare of society and the country at large requires that each man shall earn a livelihood by the sweat of his face. He must not become a beggar and a nuisance to society and later on a pensioner upon our charities and almshouses.

Hence the common and statute law reprehend monopolies which tend to bring about such an unhappy result. Trusts and monopolies are therefore contrary to good morals and to public policy, to American institutions, to the statute law of Congress in 1890, and to many State statutes, and are therefore under the ban of the law. Why, then, should they be permitted to use the mails? Why should Congress aid all trusts by permitting them to use the mails, and at the same time condemn only those that engage in interstate commerce when by barring the use of the mails to all they can all be destroyed? Why strangle those that are engaged in interstate commerce with one hand, under the act of 1890, regulating interstate commerce, and with the other hand aid those that are engaged in State and interstate commerce by allowing them to use the mail?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks on this subject by inserting the letter of Attorney-General Monnett.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JANUARY 12, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 6th instant came in the rush of inauguration and other work, and I take pleasure in now replying more fully than I could at an earlier date.

Our Ohio anti-trust act was passed April 18, 1898, to take effect July 1, 1898. Under our constitution and statutes Governor Bushnell was not required to sign the bill; he has no veto power under our constitution and, therefore, is not given authority or power to approve or disapprove of the same. We took the Sherman anti-trust act, the Texas act, and compared the various trust acts of other States, and think we got the best for our State of any that were heretofore enacted. The objectionable feature, or rather the weak part, of the act has proved to be that we can not procure the testimony of interested parties, for the reason that they claim the right of the Federal and State constitutions, on the ground that such testimony would criminate themselves.

I prepared a bill, which has been introduced by Judge Russell, of Meigs County, in the assembly this last week, in the form of a supplemental act to the anti-trust act, following the language, as well as the approval of the language in the United States Supreme Court, that is used in the interstate-commerce law, making such evidence or testimony a privileged communication, so that the evidence adduced in the trial of this class of cases can not be used against such witnesses in any subsequent prosecution. Relying upon the Federal court's decision as to the efficacy of this protection, and there being compelled to testify, it will enable us to speedily enforce the act, both by compelling the witnesses to answer in evidence before a master, referee, or other officer taking such testimony, and also compelling the officers or agents of such corporations so offending against the trust laws to answer the proper interrogatories attached to the pleadings under the old equity practice. We have a larger number of cases pending thereunder, but they have nullified the powers of the courts by refusing to answer interrogatories, produce books, or to give oral testimony. The great secrecy maintained by the head officers in this class of nefarious business makes it next to impossible to get competent testimony from without; hence the necessity of such a provision in both the State and Federal act as I prepared for Judge Russell as above referred to.

There was no member of the house or senate that had the hardihood to stand out against the anti-trust act, and there was only one man that was accused of dodging the vote and trying to do something against it; at least he did not vote for it, and is now holding a Federal place. In order to get the public sentiment so strong that the bill would pass practically without opposition, we had a committee appointed in the Senate, of which Valentine was chairman, to investigate the formation, operation, and effect of trusts upon trade and commerce within the State borders, and the disclosures therein made were such that a lobbyist could scarcely withstand the tide that was set in on behalf of the people for proper legislation to restrain the abuses of corporate combinations at the expense of the depreciated prices of the producer and the increased prices to the consumer.

I am delighted to know that you have introduced a bill with penal features to reach trusts through the powers vested in Congress in Article I, section 8, providing for the establishment of post-offices and post-roads, or bring it under the mail department. This relieves us of the State's sovereignty objection made to Congress, interfering with State commerce by attempting to reach the commerce clause through section 8. Inasmuch as the court sustained this class of legislation in lotteries, I think you are certainly producing one of the most effectual lines to reach trusts and monopolies that can not be reached through the commerce clause. I would feel complimented if you would have your clerk send me your proposed bill. One of the difficulties just now suggested to me under the proposed measure is just in what manner you can determine when they are a trust, unless you defined it in an act as explicitly as we did in our act above referred to.

Let me suggest another move in the right line, namely, to have some legislation along the line suggested in the syllabus in the case of Smyth vs. Ames, 169 U. S. 468, incorporating in Federal Statutes what they would incorporate a decision, namely, furnish statutory right for any shipper to bring action against a railroad company or common carrier, such as a pipe line, express, or telegraph, to recover back the excess that may be exacted from such shipper or patron of these common carriers whenever such charges for freight or passengers or pipe-line services shall be in excess of a fair return and upon the capital invested in such common carrier, plus the necessary expenses.

This is certainly the true solution of watered stock and fictitious bonding of common carriers. It is in harmony with the fundamental principle recognized in the right of eminent domain; or put it in another way, private property is ever held to be inviolate and can be taken only for public purposes. Therefore, when so taken for public purposes, for any more than a return upon the actual investments and the actual labor expended thereon, they cease to use it for public purposes and prostitute it to private gain. The courts certainly recognize this principle in the above case and others, that this Congress should not overlook and give the States in the Mississippi Valley and other rural districts an opportunity to protect themselves against the heavy discriminations against them.

We should not be permitted to endure two years more of paying tribute to creatures exercising governmental functions and at the same time abusing those governmental functions by carrying fictitious values on watered stock and demanding tribute to support the same. In addition to giving double or triple damages, as set forth in the principles of the Sherman Act, the United States Supreme Court ought to be given original jurisdiction in quo warranto to take away charters granted by Federal authorities, and the States could make it a similar offense against corporations having State charters.

Then, again, the act should provide for the United States to be a party plaintiff and to have the right to bring an action and obtain a restraining order or injunction on the complaint of a shipper whenever such corporation doing an interstate business was attempting to nourish these excessive values. If we are not ripe for Federal or State ownership of these quasi-public corporations exercising governmental functions, we must supervise more minutely their actions and exercise our right of control thereover and let this proposition be followed up by a committee of investigation that would give a month toward investigating the rates and abuses along this line, most of which could be obtained in the Interstate Commerce Office; the investigation would give you backing to put the bill through, and such a bill would certainly make a strong issue before the people, as one that has great merits in it, from my point of view.

To illustrate, the Buckeye Pipe Line Company, one of the constituent companies of the Standard Oil Company, charges 20 cents a barrel, or about $1 per ton, for shipping oil through their pipe lines any distance; the average producer shipping a few lines to their nearest tank, and it costs less than 5 mills per ton per mile through their pipe line, and yet, while they are exercising their right of eminent domain and doing a State and interstate business as common carriers, you can see the enormous per cent they received over and above a fair return of their investment, being several thousand per cent greater than they should be entitled to under the principle laid down in Smyth vs. Ames.

Believing at all times that the sovereignty of the Government is supreme, the creator more powerful than the creature, I hope you will work out the true solution of the problems along the lines you have already started, and if my suggestions are of any value, I will be glad to assist the cause.

Hoping to have the pleasure of seeing you when I am in Washington, I am, yours, very truly,

JOHN W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

F. S. MONNETT.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], who is controlling the time on the other side, to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to be a member of Congress from Tennessee. I am a Democrat and elected as such, and certainly no one who knows or is acquainted with the political conditions in Tennessee will suppose that a Democrat comes here charged with any great amount of love and affection for the Hon. H. Clay Evans—I mean from a political standpoint; and I am not up here to defend Mr. Evans in any respect whatever. But he is the Commissioner, and it is his acts as Commissioner that I propose to notice, and only briefly.

Now, we all know, who think for a moment and consider the surroundings of the Commissioner as a citizen and as a Republican in Tennessee, that there could not be any motive on his part from a political standpoint in administering the Pension Office so as to meet with the disapproval of those who favor liberal pensions. I look at another thing. He must have come into that office prejudiced against Democrats, and he did not expect to win any favor from the Democrats by pursuing a course approved by them. He was not looking for it, he was not seeking it, and he could not and did not expect any favor from Democrats. If he had been seeking political promotion or help in his own State from his own party, I say he has certainly made a mistake in conscientiously construing the laws as he finds them. Every temptation was in the other direction; every temptation was to be liberal to pensioners.

While his ambition was not confined to the State of Tennessee it was not confined to the borders of that State, because it was known that he was a candidate for the Vice-Presidency. It is known that he was an applicant for a Cabinet position, and he ought to know if he was looking for favor among the old soldiers—I will not say among the old soldiers, but from that army of pension grabbers and attorneys that are hounding him to his political death—that he could not expect to get it by a strict construction of the pension laws. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] did not say it in words, but he insinuated that he was not honestly administering the law; that the laws were all right, and if the Commissioner would only do his duty there would be nothing of which to complain.

Now, if the laws are all right, then it is only a question of construction, and, as shown by the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], there are appeals from his decisions which have been taken and which can be taken.

My honest opinion is that the speech of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was made for home consumption, and was intended to benefit himself locally and those standing in need of such benefit, and that he was not sincere in the tirade which he has made here to-day. No resolutions have been introduced to investigate the Pension Office or the rulings of the Commissioner.

Well, let us look at a pension. What is it? A gratuity—simply a gratuity. Then should not those seeking that gratuity clearly establish their title to it? Ought they not to place themselves within the provision of the law that gives them this gratuity?

Then, shall it be said that a Commissioner of Pensions is dishonest who requires that the provisions of the most liberal pension laws ever enacted in any country on the face of the earth should be construed with at least reasonable strictness? Do they expect the Commissioner to come here and say, in effect, "These laws were intended to give everybody pensions who are entitled to them, but I will override the law, and not scrutinize the evidence, and give pensions to those who apply, simply because they have applied?" It is known that applications have been filed from some of the regiments engaged in the recent Spanish war almost if not equal to 50 per cent of the entire membership of the regiment, and those applications must be for disabilities of service origin.

If a regiment serving not over six months in the late war with Spain, that never fired a gun and never was in battle, a regiment composed of hale and hardy young men, has already made applications equal to 50 per cent of the entire membership of that regiment—if that number of these young men are applying for pensions on the ground of service disability, is it not something to attract the attention of this House? Should not the Commissioner of Pensions, in the discharge of his duty, scrutinize the evidence to support such application? Should he be condemned for taking the necessary time to properly investigate and determine the facts in the case?

Now, upon that ratio I do not know exactly how long the war has been over, for it hardly commenced before it was over; but if 50 per cent of some regiments are already applying for pensions due to service origin, in another twelve months I suppose the whole number will be on the application list. Yet an executive officer of the Government is to be condemned because he does not grant pensions in proportion to the rate of applications. That is what has been charged here. We are to-day comparing the number of pensions granted in a given time with the number of applications, and condemning him for investigating each case as he ought to. It is more important now than it ever was to investigate pension cases carefully.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why does the gentleman from Tennessee say that a pension is a gratuity?

Mr. SIMS. Because it is the truth; that is the reason.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it not a solemn obligation upon this Government—an implied contract, sacred and binding—that those who bore the brunt of battle shall not ask in vain for help from the Government they saved?

Mr. SIMS. It is a gratuity, as held, determined, and acted upon.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it not a vested right, when once granted, to be enjoyed by the veteran, and of which he can not be deprived at the whim of any man?

Mr. SIMS. It is a pure gratuity. It is not a contract; it is not a contract obligation. It is a gratuity which I do not propose to criticize. But they who ask for charity should not condemn the donors for not being overrapid in granting it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he thinks it is right to say that this is a mere charity? When men gave their lives and their services to their country in time of peril, does it not raise a higher question than one of mere charity and gratuity? Does it not fix an obligation upon this Government to see that its defenders do not suffer or come to want?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Michigan has stated the grounds and the motives that will move us in the bestowal of the gratuity, but he does not change the nature of the case.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Has it not been held that a pension is a vested right? Is it not so regarded in law?

Mr. SIMS. If so, I have not read the decision.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am quite sure it has been so held whenever a test has been made.

Mr. SIMS. There was a bill introduced and tried to be passed to make it a vested right, and I therefore suppose it was not so held.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It has, as I believe, been formally decreed that it is a vested right; and I think in the case of Justice Long, of the State of Michigan, where an attempt was made to deprive him of a pension because they said he was drawing a salary as a justice of the supreme court of that State, I believe the court ruled that it was a vested right and that a pension once granted should not be frivolously taken away by the mere whim of a Commissioner of Pensions. I do not like the language of the gentleman from Tennessee that a pension is charity. It is a sacred debt of honor, a binding obligation, and the Government is doing itself great credit and great honor when it treats these soldiers liberally and well.

Mr. SIMS. I am glad to have a good speech delivered in my time. It will read well in my speech; but unsound and untrue.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, I take issue with you on the statements made.

Mr. SIMS. But the right to a pension is not a vested right before it is granted, whatever it may be after it is granted. I have not seen the decision which the gentleman refers to, and I think he is mistaken in saying so, because bill after bill has been introduced in this House to make a pension a vested right after once granted and to require notice before the pensioner could be taken off the pension roll. But I was making this point: The Commissioner of Pensions is criticised for not granting pensions in proportion to the number of applications. I say if there ever was a time when we ought to be careful, now is the time. The war between the States is a matter of memory almost. Over thirty years have elapsed since it occurred, and where our liberal pension laws have not enabled soldiers of that war to be pensioned by this time, it seems to me there must be some weakness in their cases and that caution and care should be exercised.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If the gentleman will permit me, the reason why many of the soldiers of that war have not been pensioned heretofore is because they have not asked for pensions until by the force of circumstances they needed it; and when that time arrived, I do not think the Government ought to be too rigid in its construction of the rule that will permit these men to get their just deserts from the Government. I would make the laws more liberal, and feel sure the Commissioner would gladly administer them.

Mr. SIMS. All honor to men who have waited thirty years before asking for a pension. I say that, but they are few and their voices are low and weak.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; but all honor to any man who fought in defense of his country. The small sum he gets as a pension will only be his just reward, and a great country can do no less than justice by its soldiers.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman should bear in mind that hundreds and thousands of these applications now pending are for increases.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; and many are for original pensions. Thousands of deserving soldiers are waiting to have their cases decided. And, while I would not criticize the administration of the Pension Bureau in any particular case, I do feel that it is the duty of the Government to be liberal and to give quickly and promptly, if it is going to give at all, and not wait until these men have answered the last drumbeat and passed beyond the reach of Congress and beyond the help of this Government. Let us show our appreciation while they live and not wait to strew flowers on their graves after they are dead.

Mr. SIMS. That expression of the gentleman brings to my mind something which occurred in the last Congress. No longer ago than last winter a case came before us in the Pension Committee, or several cases, where officers were killed in the Spanish war. Their widows were to get $30 a month under the law, and very promptly there came in bills to increase those pensions to double that amount in some instances. And the argument was made before us in that committee that we should give quickly and give doubly and encourage the volunteers by letting them know that their widows and orphans would be well protected and cared for in case they died or were killed.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman object to that policy?

Mr. SIMS. I most emphatically objected to it. I said, Let the widows stand under the law on the same footing with the widows of the war of the rebellion. Does not the gentleman say that also?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not believe the gentleman from Tennessee represents the best sentiment of the Democratic party upon that side of the Chamber in that statement.

Mr. SIMS. I represent the cause of truth; and if the Democratic party does not sanction it, that is their fault, not mine.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the passage of pension bills here it has been to the eternal credit of members upon that side of the Chamber, many of whom were in the Confederate army, that they have thrown less obstruction in the way of a liberal administration of the pension law than they have ever been given credit for doing. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I admit what you have said is true in some instances, and it is true from the same motive, I have no doubt, that animated some of those present on your side or those who had claims for pensions for the soldiers.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is a poor excuse.

Mr. SIMS. You have made a statement, and we will investigate it. We find that on the Friday night sessions for the consideration of private bills—I am willing to say that it is true of some Democrats as well as Republicans—there comes the cry of "Vote!" "Vote!" and we can not even have the report read or any intelligent action taken on it before the cry is "Vote!" "Vote!" Some of those cries come from Democrats and some from Republicans. They do not want to hear anything further; they do not want to have an investigation so as to show those who furnish the money on what grounds these pensions are to be paid.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell the number of pension bills that pass and become law?

Mr. SIMS. A great many.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. None of them do.

Mr. SIMS. Too many pass.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They do not become law.

Mr. SIMS. They have been passed and became laws and will be passed again, and I will tell you why. Right here, night after night, in every Friday night session, there is no quorum in this House. Only those as a rule, either Republicans, Democrats, or Populists, attend the Friday night sessions who have bills they are personally interested in, and consequently every gentleman is ready to vote, and ready to vote a pension for some other gentleman he does not approve in order to get his own bill through. In almost every instance, almost uniformly, these bills are passed, voting away the people's money without proper investigation, in fact without any investigation on the part of the House.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman has been here long enough to know that these private pension bills, considered at the Friday night sessions, are of no avail to the pensioners. These bills pass on a Friday night in Committee of the Whole and go to the House Calendar, and are never reached; and if we are going to do anything for the soldier, you must liberalize the pension laws and allow them to be administered liberally at the proper department.

Mr. SIMS. That proves clearly that the gentleman from Michigan does not know what he is talking about. There were more than 600 private pension bills passed last Congress.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do know what I am talking about.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman says that the bills passed here at the Friday night sessions do not pass and become laws.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They are of no avail.

Mr. SIMS. Why?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman must know that the bills passed on Friday nights never become of any avail to the pensioner.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. My time has been largely consumed by others, and I should like to have some more time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I apologize for occupying so much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. SIMS. That is all right. I should like to have about ten minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not desire to occupy the gentleman's time, but I would like to have him say—

Mr. BARNEY. I would like to inquire of the Chair how much time has been occupied on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-five minutes has been occupied on the side of the gentleman from Wisconsin and forty-five minutes on the side of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARNEY. Already occupied?

Mr. BENTON. How long do I understand the debate has to continue?

The CHAIRMAN. Until 4 o'clock.

Mr. BENTON. So that there are fifty-five minutes remaining for each side?

The CHAIRMAN. There are fifty minutes remaining to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and sixty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BENTON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why there should be such delay on the subject of Spanish soldiers' applications as to almost amount to absolute exclusion?

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that there ought to be such delay as is necessary to permit a judicious determination of those cases.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But it amounts to exclusion.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, it does not amount to exclusion. The great majority of the soldiers who were engaged in the Spanish war were young men, who have a long life before them. Now, you want to have them pensioned as boys, when they have long lives before them, and to be drawing pensions all that time. I say that any Commissioner of Pensions, regardless of politics, ought to take such time as is necessary to properly investigate and determine the facts of a case when it is before him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But what construction would you put on such action where one has lost an arm or a leg, or his health has been ruined in an unhealthy climate?

Mr. SIMS. Of course I can only speak in a general way. I can not go into the details of that question. But if a case is made as strong as the gentleman from Indiana puts it, I am certain he could go to the office and get the case made special.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. There are hundreds of cases where men have had their legs and arms cut off in the Spanish-American war that are being held up.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman charge there are hundreds of cases where men lost their arms and legs during the Spanish war who are being held up?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Or have been injured by sickness.

Mr. SIMS. But your statement was that they had lost their arms or legs.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. But men can be sick enough without the loss of arm or leg to be entitled to pension.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, you have got another statement before me now. I am not prepared to answer; but here is what I want to say. You condemn the executive officers of the Government because they do not more liberally, hurriedly execute the law which has very liberal provisions, and this criticism comes from members of Congress who pass these private pension bills night after night without study or information. When 50 private pension bills are passed through this House in one night it is utterly impossible for Congress, with all the pressure of members, who cry "Vote!" "Vote!" to act upon them intelligently.

Well, if you will stand up here and vote away the people's money on Friday nights without a quorum, when you can not wait to hear what is in the report and show so much impatience with the chairman of the committee when he rises to make a statement, what weight has any criticism by a member of Congress who will do that upon any executive officer of the United States? I arraign and charge the members of Congress—not in this Congress, for there has not been a private bill night for pensions—for voting for pension bills without one particle of investigation. If they will do that as members of this body, can you expect anything less than criticism if you do not open the door to every avenue to take money out of the Treasury and put it into the pockets of the applicants?

No longer ago than last session, there came a pension bill over from the Senate to pension the widow of a professor in the school at Annapolis, who had never enlisted, who drew a salary of $2,500 for twenty-five years, and they wanted to pension that widow at $50 a month and pull the money out by a system of taxation in consumption from widows who do not own $50 worth of property in the world in order to pay such pensions. I stood up and fought against it, but a tremendous pressure was brought to bear to pass the bill, which had no status in law or in equity, only the desire of members of Congress to make a donation to a worthy and estimable lady. And then to hear gentlemen who, without the slightest consideration, are willing to vote for bills like this, get up and denounce the Administration because it is slow. I condemn it because it is not slow enough. That is the trouble; they do not take pains enough; they grant pensions that ought not to be granted.

Now, I want to have the Clerk read some of the applications that are made here that members are weeping over because they are not hastily granted.

The Clerk read as follows from the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. BENTON. That is, the men had filed two claims under the same law?

Mr. EVANS. Yes, sir; the men may have filed three or four. They strike different pension attorneys, and they persuade them they have better facilities, and so they file another claim, and those claims have to be considered, jacketed, filed, etc.

Now, another thing makes a large number of rejections.

Men are now filing claims for new disabilities under the old law. They have had a pension for many years for certain disabilities. Age and the infirmities of age come on and they are disabled more and more, and they file an application for a new disability. There is nothing of it in the war records as a basis to work that claim on. They are given the privilege under the practice to prove the existence of that disability is of service origin.

Possibly that claimant has had a half dozen or a dozen medical examinations during this period that he has been pensioned, but this new disability for which he sets up a claim has not been made apparent by the medical examination of half a dozen or dozen, as the case may be, so that it is pretty hard for a man, after thirty-five years or more have elapsed, to prove a new disability which he claims is of service origin, and the claim must necessarily be rejected under the law. I can not allow those claims unless they are established by proof, because the records are against them to start with.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, you will see some of these applications the gentlemen are so disturbed about. They are applications for pensions by men who have already been pensioned, who have been examined as much as half a dozen times, and now they are asking for pensions upon grounds that never were disclosed before, in medical examinations which show every ground for which they were entitled to a pension at time of examination; and then you say that the Commissioner or the executive officer ought not to be cautious in such cases.

With the record all against such an applicant, with the medical examinations, as many as a half a dozen, showing no disability of a certain kind, he comes in twenty-five or thirty years afterwards and asks for a pension on a new ground. And then members get wild and furious on the floor of this House because he does not get his pension quick enough, because they are not dealt out with such haste as would not secure a proper investigation. My criticism is that there is too much haste for the good of the country.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I want to ask a sincere and candid question and receive a sincere and candid answer. Is not the gentleman opposed to pension laws? As a general proposition, is he not opposed to the whole thing?

Mr. SIMS. No; I am not opposed to pensions as a general principle, but I am opposed to taking advantage of a general principle and abusing it so that the burdens of the people are such as never were borne by any people with so much patience.

The general principle we have forgotten, lost it, and are in favor of reckless administration of the pension laws. Look at the first pension laws and the pensions granted under them. Were they not honest and liberal then? It has often been stated, what General Garfield said, that thirty or forty millions was the maximum of pension appropriations on account of the late war. Now, it was one hundred and thirty-eight millions paid out last year. One war is hardly over before another is on. Is it not time to call a halt and investigate, and be sure that a man is entitled to a pension before you give it, and make it a vested right, according to the gentleman from Michigan, so that you can not get it away from him?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I am not through, but I will subside.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 386. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands."

Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the dredging and other improvements of the harbor at Warroad, Minn.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CARTER, Mr. HALE, and Mr. MCENERY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a Senate bill and resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 386. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands—to the Committee on Public Lands.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 16:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the dredging and other improvements of the harbor at Warroad, Minn.—

to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BARNEY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with deep interest to the discussion by the various gentlemen on this subject of pensions, and notice a wide difference between some of them. For instance, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wm. ALDEN SMITH] has said within a few moments that at our Friday night meetings we grant too few special pension bills, while the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asserts that we grant too many by far and with little investigation. The gentleman from Michigan inquired how many private pension bills had been granted by special legislation within the last two Congresses. The Fifty-fourth Congress passed 378 that became laws, and the Fifty-fifth Congress enacted into law, with the approval of the President, 693 private pension bills. There was, however, quite a wide difference in the rates of increase of pensions allowed between those enacted into law by the last Congress and those enacted into law by the Fifty-fourth Congress.

In the one case—the Fifty-fifth Congress—each bill carried $13.55 a month additional, on an average, while in the Fifty-fourth Congress each bill carried $19.74 increase, on an average. In the Fifty-fifth Congress no private pension bill—with one exception, that of a private soldier—carried over $50 per month. In other words, in the last Congress we deemed it best to give aid to a greater number with the same amount of money rather than to have the appearance of extravagance, and so we aided about double the number with about the same amount of money.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not want my time all used up in queries, because I have other matters that I desire to refer to. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. RIDGELY. Do you not think, in view of the increasing age of the soldiers, that we should in this Congress increase, even above the last, the number that we help?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, certainly; when we find a deserving case requiring special action we should be prompt to act.

Now, I was about to come to this question. We have written upon the statute books a general law which grants a pension to all the old soldiers who incurred certain disabilities, from which they now suffer, while in the service of the United States, the amount depending on the nature and extent of the disability. Then we have the act of June 27, 1890, which grants a pension to the old soldier whether he incurred his disability in the service or not, regardless of that question, if he is now so situated that he can not earn a livelihood by manual labor; under this act a pension in excess of $12 per month can not be allowed. Now, this has given rise to a great deal of criticism throughout the country, because there is a class of men who say that the old soldier who incurred no disability whatever in the service should not, under any circumstances, be granted a pension. On the other hand, the great mass of the American people say that when the old soldier, who served his country long and faithfully, becomes old and poor and unable to earn a living, he should be kept out of the almshouse, kept from want, and so should have the pension, whether or not he incurred his disability in the service, the maximum of which is $12 a month.

Under the general law the pension granted is rated according to the disability incurred in the service, and can not include disability incurred since. Now, a misunderstanding of these two acts and a confusion of their provisions has led to a great deal of criticism of the Commissioner of Pensions and a great deal of fault-finding, not only among members of Congress who do not understand the law, but among citizens generally, and especially among the old soldiers themselves, simply because they do not understand the law. Now, let me illustrate how this misunderstanding arises. Here is an old soldier who contracted disabilities in the service, and under the law and rulings of the Department is entitled, we will say, to $25 a month on account of such disabilities. His disabilities incurred in the service entitle him to that, and still he is able to do a great deal of work. Here is another old soldier in the same neighborhood who incurred no disability whatever in the service, but who is poor and unable to work at all, and who receives from the Pension Office $12 per month, which is all they can give him, as that is the maximum and is fixed by law.

A large number of citizens in the neighborhood, and many of the old soldiers themselves who do not understand the reason of this difference, say, "Here is one man no worse off than the other; the one gets $25 per month and the other only gets $12. The law is unjust." And they condemn the Commissioner of Pensions. They assume that he is responsible. He must obey the law. The one received his disability while fighting under the flag; the other received no disability there, but it has come upon him since he left the service, and the pension is given to him in such case as a gratuity, we may say, to aid him and keep him from actual want. The Commissioner has no discretion whatever in such cases. He is forbidden to pension the same soldier under both acts at the same time.

Now, again, the Commissioner of Pensions is criticised severely by some of the old soldiers because the ratings of the local boards are not followed and because under the law they can not be as they are made by local boards, who do not fully understand the law, and who, in rating the disabilities, do not understand or at least do not draw the distinction between those incurred in the service and those not incurred in the service. Here, for instance, is an old soldier who was shot through the leg or the arm or the body while fighting under the flag, and it may be has lost a limb. By reason of that disability he is, we will say, entitled to $15 per month, or perhaps $25 or $30 per month, according to the disability of service origin. Since the war closed he has from some other cause become totally paralyzed, absolutely helpless.

Now, all he can get under any law is $15 per month, or $25, or $30, as the case may be, because that is the full measure of the pension to which he is entitled under the general law. His paralysis or total helplessness came by reason of something that has occurred since the war, and if you drop out the service disability and pension him for his paralysis, all that the Commissioner of Pensions can give him is $12 per month. But the local board of surgeons, when they rated his disability, said, "He is totally disabled." They did not draw the distinction between the two laws; the board did not distinguish his service disabilities from those incurred since, and they rate him at $72 per month, the rate for total disability of service origin. Well, now, the Commissioner of Pensions must administer the law as he finds it, and he must distinguish the service from the nonservice disability. He can not increase that man's pension a single cent on account of the disability not of service origin, notwithstanding the fact that the local board has rated him at $72 per month.

Now, I mention this to show how unjustly the Commissioner of Pensions is criticised. I mention it again for the purpose of answering the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who, in my judgement, has made a most unwarranted and unjustifiable attack upon the Commissioner of Pensions. Equally unwarranted is the statement that the President is ignorant of what is being done at the Pension Office. I do not stand here authorized to champion the Commissioner of Pensions. I do not stand here as a special friend of his, but having served for two years as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I have been brought in frequent contact with him and with his administration of the law. I do not approve all the rules of the Bureau of Pensions, but on the whole they are wise and necessary. In some cases I had occasion to differ with him, in some cases to argue with him, and in a very few cases our committee overruled him because we thought such action just and proper and that the conditions warranted it, but only in a very few cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Criticism has been made that claims when allowed are not made to commence at the date of the filing of the first application. The act of March 6, 1896, is very plain in its provisions and provides—

That whenever a claim for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, has been or shall hereafter be rejected, suspended, or dismissed, and a new application shall have been or shall hereafter be filed, and a pension has been or shall hereafter be allowed in such claim, such pension shall date from the time of filing the first application: Provided—

And now mark and heed the proviso—

Provided, That the evidence in the case shall show a pensionable disability to have existed or to exist at the time of filing such first application, anything in any law or ruling of the Department to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is very plain that no pension under this act can be granted to commence at a date prior to that when a pensionable rate of disability is shown to exist or to have existed. No other construction is possible; and if Congress wants a different law applied, it must first make it.

Mr. Chairman, I ought to call attention to the wisdom and liberality of our pension laws. We have the most liberal pension system of any nation of the earth. The soldier totally disabled by reason of army service and requiring constant aid and attendance gets $72 per month. No man should assert that this is too much. Every man who periled his life that this nation might live, and in so doing received wounds or incurred disabilities of any kind that have reduced him to a condition of helplessness, should be kindly, tenderly, and efficiently cared for by a generous and a patriotic people. So in proportion to the disabilities incurred in the service should the helping hand be extended. But in extending this aid on such grounds care must be taken to ascertain by satisfactory proof that the alleged disabilities exist and are of service origin and not the result of vicious conduct since the war closed.

Thirty-five years after the war it is difficult to procure proof in many cases, and the Pension Bureau is charged with delaying claims. I have failed to discover any case where the present Commissioner has assented to any act tending to delay the adjudication of a claim. During the last year there have been added to the rolls on original claims 37,077 names, and 3,914 were restored. Add to this list the thousands of cases where increases have been granted, the Spanish war claims allowed, and we see how unjust the charge of delay in the Bureau. During the same year death has claimed 34,345 pensioners, and they are passing away at about this rate, but June 30, 1899, we had remaining on the pension rolls a great army of 991,519. To these pensioners we paid last year $188,355,052. Over 300,000 claims for increase are now pending and thousands of claims for original pension in addition, and now comes the added claims for pension on account of the Spanish war, over 6,000 now demanding and clamoring for immediate consideration.

In 1899 the Commissioner sent out and received 5,773,512 letters, and a vast amount of labor has been done on pending claims not adjudicated. The total force in the Pension Office is only 1,741, and when we consider the work completed and the work done on pending cases not disposed of we may well be astonished that so much has been accomplished. Certainly no thoughtful and just-minded man can charge delay against the Commissioner of Pensions. The Government has been just and liberal, and no unwelcome clamor should be raised against the administration of our Pension Bureau. Those who incite discontent among the old soldiers of the Republic feed fat the opposers of our pension system, who demand against it and charge the pensioners with unpatriotic greed. They point to the discontent as evidence that our pension system is unwise, and argue that it would be far better to repeal all laws on the subject.

Mr. GAINES. If the gentleman will permit me, I should like to answer the question that my friend from Ohio put to my colleague [Mr. SIMS] a little while ago about his being opposed to any kind of a pension. I want to say to him, and I say to everybody here, that I never heard a Southerner in my life say that he was opposed to paying an honest or a just pension—never in my life.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not agree with any gentleman who charges the gentleman with opposition to just pensions. I have found him reasonable, patriotic, and only desirous of careful scrutiny in passing private pension bills.

In administering the law the Commissioner of Pensions must carefully examine or cause to be examined every claim; he must see that proof is furnished in every case, for if he does not the Bureau will be flooded with unjust and fraudulent claims, and the whole pension system discredited and brought into disrepute. The "roll of honor," of which all are so proud, must, as it always has been, be kept purged of every imputation of fraud from a respectable source. The soldier himself feels this and is opposed to unmerited pensions.

I want to say here emphatically, and I want the old soldiers in my district to hear it, and I want the old soldiers all over the country to hear it, that I believe the present Commissioner of Pensions in the administration of the pension laws of the United States has acted and is acting to-day faithfully, honestly, and intelligently, and is trying to carry out the law as he finds it written for the benefit of the old soldiers and their widows and orphans. That he has made mistakes I will not deny. We all make mistakes. But the man who rises here and condemns him as unfriendly to the pension laws or unfriendly to the old soldier is, in my judgment, unjust to himself and unjust to the Commissioner of Pensions. And I regret that any man on this side of the Chamber has taken that position. That injustice is sometimes done at the Pension Bureau I do not deny, but the Commissioner will correct all errors when attention is called to them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to one or two other things, and the limit of my time will prevent my saying all that I desire to say. I called the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the fact that there was an appeal from these decisions of the Commissioner of Pensions and that on the particular subjects to which he referred the Commissioner has been sustained by Mr. Webster Davis, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior—and, of course, that carries with it the approval of the Secretary of the Interior—and a bill is already pending now, and will undoubtedly be enacted into law, that will correct all evils complained of and leave no room for doubt in the interpretation of it. When questions of fact are presented the soldier should always be given the benefit of the doubt, and our pension laws should be liberally construed to carry out the intent.

Again, it has been claimed that great injustices are being done to the widows of the old soldiers by H. Clay Evans, Commissioner, because he so construed the law as to hold that $96 per year net income is made the measure that entitles her to a pension under the act of 1890. Well, now, that decision has been sustained, and lawyers, men of good judgment everywhere, sustain the Commissioner, and the remedy is to correct the law itself. Let Congress change the law or take the "cussing"—the Commissioner is not at fault. So a bill has been introduced in the Senate and has passed that body, and I hope it will pass this House, making $250 the measure. That, of course, I think is more just and more equitable, because no man on either side of the Chamber would claim for a single moment that $96 per year is sufficient to support the widow of an old soldier, with an added pension of $8 per month, the maximum allowed a widow under the act of June 27, 1890. This question was of so much importance that Commissioner Evans recommended the change in the law and the President of the United States called attention to the subject in his annual message.

As the years come and go, whitening the heads of our deserving pensioners and adding to their physical infirmities, I would see the laws made more liberal, for no deserving old soldier or war widow should ever know actual want or stand in fear of the almshouse. At the same time care must be exercised lest extravagance in this direction lead to more stringent laws instead of conservative liberality. It must be remembered that the act of June, 1890, only applies to the widows of soldiers who served in the war of the rebellion, and that they are getting old and feeble, and hence when dependent and entitled to the benefits of that law $8 per month is a very small sum indeed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is not $8 per month exactly the sum you give to all Mexican soldiers?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is that enough for them?

Mr. RAY of New York. My friend, you do not understand me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Maybe not.

Mr. RAY of New York. Eight dollars per month is all we give the widow of a soldier of the war of the rebellion—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know.

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). Under the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You say that is not enough?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is not the question I was referring to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought you were,

Mr. RAY of New York. I was referring to this: It has been held in construing the act of June 27, 1890, that if the widow of an old soldier has an income of $96 a year, she is not within the act of June 27, 1890, and they will not give her a pension.

Mr. WEEKS. She was not dependent.

Mr. RAY of New York. They held that she was not dependent. In other words, they held that $96 a year was, in the eye of the law, enough to support her with a pension of $8 per month added. The Government by pension legislation has not assumed to fully support or care for its soldiers or soldiers' widows, but only to give a reasonable amount of aid in certain cases. If the act referred to becomes a law, and I hope it will, widows having an income of $250 per annum, net, will get $8 per month pension.

Now, my friend from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has referred to another fact, and he complains and criticises the Commissioner of Pensions because he has held up certain claims of persons he calls minor children. No case of a minor child has been held up. No case has been held up, nor is there any want of speedy construction of the law or determination of the case where the child is under 16 years of age. But the Commissioner of Pensions found this condition existing: A man 30, 35, or perhaps 40 years of age comes to the Pension Office with a claim for $1,000, $2,000, $3,000, or possibly $4,000 back pension, claiming that he was the son of an old soldier, that while he was under 16 years of age he became entitled to a pension of $3 a month, that the pension was never applied for in his behalf by any person, and it was not drawn. He, having discovered that fact now and having arrived at the age of 25, 30, or 40 years, puts in a claim for that pension that he or his mother or guardian would have been entitled to draw when he was under 16 years of age.

Mr. Chairman, that pension was intended for the use of the mother or the guardian of the infant in his support while in infancy, but it was not needed, and so was not called for. Now, having reached maturity, being well off, well to do in the world, this man puts in this claim for this back pension that accrued years ago when he was under 16 years of age. The Commissioner of Pensions believes, as I believe, and as I think all good and patriotic men are bound to believe, that under the law that $3 a month was given to aid the minor in his or her support while he needed it; to aid the mother or the guardian in taking care of and educating that child at the time when he needed it. If he did not need it, if it was not applied for, I say it is not just to the Government and it is unjust to the old soldiers, needy and poor, and the needy widows of the old soldier to give the claimant that back pension now. Thousands of broken and needy old veterans who answered when the call was made need help from the nation, and let the money go to them.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I agree with you.

Mr. RAY of New York. I agree with the Commissioner. That class of claims has been held up. That ruling was first made by Judge Lochren, and Mr. Evans has followed it. The question will soon be determined, and if it is decided against the Government by the Department having it in charge I trust that Congress will pass a law, if we have the power, that will cut off such claims and prevent taking money from the Treasury for any such purpose. Mr. Chairman, there are many thousands of old soldiers scattered all over this land, old, poor, and in need, struggling to keep out of the poorhouses, and there are thousands of old and deserving war widows, who were the wives of the defenders of the nation during the war, who are now poor and needy, making their just claims upon the Government of the United States, and in my judgment they are entitled first to be considered and first to be cared for. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I wish that my time was for an hour at least. I would like to talk dispassionately on this question, for unless at some time in the history of this Congress or the history of some other Congress we can so talk upon this subject honestly and devoid of partisanship and sectionalism, then justice will never be done to the men of the war of 1861 to 1865. I asked a question simply of my friend, because he is my friend, and his guardian from Tennessee, not waiting until I spoke to this House, must put a different imputation upon the question from that which I intended.

When I turn to the right I see men that were in the Confederacy, some of whom I know and faced in the battles in 1862. There is not one that ever faced a Northern soldier but is manly and just and fair. I can look them in the face and say, gentlemen, what would have occurred if the Confederacy had been successful? Every man within your army that deserved a pension would have had it, and would have been entitled to it, and not one of you would criticise such action.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman, on that line, that most of the Confederate States are paying pensions out of their State treasuries.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I know it, and I honor them for it. It shows the patriotism and the earnestness with which you of the South consider the interests of the men who defended your homes and the homes in which they live. I greatly regret to hear carping upon this floor upon questions that ought to be considered in a better spirit. I am not here to criticize Mr. H. Clay Evans, and yet I make the charge that the rules under the Pension Department, the rules of construction under the law, have been more unjust than have ever been applied in any court, even in the United States. Under the law of 1890 a man who never received an injury in the war, or a disease, is receiving a greater pension than those men who served for three years during the war and who are diseased. Why? Because under the construction of the law you demand that these men apply for an original pension, showing proof by two comrades—as if one comrade could not speak the truth—when and where and under what circumstances his disease was contracted. If he fails to do that, you reject his claim, and all the appeals to Webster Davis, or God Almighty, or those above the earth or below the earth, make no difference; he must meet with defeat.

These things are unjust, they are unfair, they are unreasonable. You demand the record in the War Department as if the War Department was infallible; and to-day a soldier putting a claim before the Pension Commissioner with an honorable discharge from the Government can not receive a pension because the record does not show that he was mustered into the service.

A MEMBER. He has a hospital record.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Yes, the hospital record seems to be the prevailing record. I venture to say that men who came to Washington and served on Pennsylvania avenue or on the heights beyond for three months are the largest pensioners to-day of their class that there is upon the entire pension roll.

Let us not criticize H. Clay Evans, but let us demand that an honest administration of the law shall be had. You can do it, and I look upon you gentlemen here to lay aside party and prejudice and aid in securing justice and right. Personally I esteem H. Clay Evans. I met him upon the stump in Ohio. I have known him ever since he has been Commissioner. I have no objection on earth to Webster Davis. He is over in Africa to-day investigating matters in the Transvaal, and I presume as soon as he returns and gets to these cases he will do absolute and eternal justice. I say I met H. Clay Evans on the stump in Ohio when every soldier of my State was looking for him. Why? Because they had received a communication from the secretary of a Senator that their claims were going to be immediately adjusted, and they were there hunting up H. Clay to have it done while he was there. After the election was over the secretary could not be found, the Senator was engaged with troubles of his own, and Mr. Evans is left alone in his struggle to frame and comply with rules that will enable the Department to deny ten thousand claims and admit ten.

In the great struggle of 1896, before he was fully under subjection to the powerful syndicates and trusts that now govern and control his actions, the great and true heart of President McKinley was shown to the American people when, in his letter of acceptance, he wrote:

The men who were willing to die for their country must not be left helpless and defenseless by the country.

And again, while speaking to his fellow-citizens at Akron, Ohio, he said:

The soldiers and sailors of the Union should neither be neglected nor forgotten. They are men who are justly entitled to generous aid in their increasing necessities.

In platforms, in campaign speeches, and wherever talk would count the present dominant party has paraded itself as the only soldier's friend. Mr. Chairman, to do is to do; but how not to do is what this country, especially the old soldiers of the land, is learning to be the position of the Republican party on the pension question.

Existing laws regarding pensions are clear, specific, and well settled by judicial construction, but they become clouded, misleading, or completely nullified under the forced construction of them by the Pension Department as set forth by rules and orders of practice issued by the authority of the Pension Commissioner. The Department assumes to itself the right to prescribe in what way and upon what conditions members of Congress may presume to do business with it. It denies to any attorney the privilege of speaking to a member regarding any pension case before the Department.

I have in my district a State soldiers' home, and not a day passes but I find in my mail appeal after appeal from the old veterans to aid them in securing simple justice. In one received to-day is the comment:

It is plainly evident that when over 100,000 rejections occur in a year, law or no law, nothing is taken into consideration but the haphazard decision of a one-man power.

Others I receive are full of condemnation of the Commissioner on account of the seeming unnecessary delay. I know that it is an impossibility for the Commissioner to pass individually upon every application; but I claim that his office force, his heads of divisions, his board of review, and medical referees should not be chosen and continued in place solely on account of their hostility to the soldiers and antagonism to laws whose provisions it is their duty to see carried into effect, and no rules or orders should be made or sanctioned that abrogates the spirit and intent of the laws passed by Congress, even though it be done in the interest of economy.

The Grand Army of the Republic has year after year advocated and contended for safeguards around the pension roll that it might be indeed a roll of honor. They have demanded that the utmost vigilance be maintained that no fraud be committed and no unworthy claim allowed, but, on the other hand, they have sought constantly to secure the prompt and faithful discharge of the nation's obligations to its defenders and their dependent ones. In national convention assembled they have asked President McKinley to dismiss Commissioner Evans, not from any personal ill will against him, but because he represents in the maintenance of unlawful rules and orders a barrier in the way of the soldier who freely, gladly, gave the best years of his life to his country now receiving his just and proper recognition.

I could go on and bring specific charges and details—they come to me in private correspondence; they are published in the newspapers throughout the land—but I will only take up one item, presented by the Grand Army of the Republic at their last convention at Philadelphia in 1899, in regard to the so-called Order No. 225, which is as follows:

Order No. 225.

As to adjudicating and fixing rates of pension under the act of June 27, 1890.

(1) A claim for pension under the second section of the act of June 27, 1890, can only be allowed upon proof of mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits, incapacitating him from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support.

(2) No specific injury or disability can as such have a pensionable rating under that act nor be considered otherwise than as it affects the capacity of the claimant to perform ordinary manual labor.

(3) Proof that the disability is not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits is requisite, and therefore the causes and circumstances of the origin of the disability should be shown by the evidence furnished in support of the claim for pension, so far as can be done, and by persons other than the claimant.

(4) To give the claimant a pensionable status under this act, the disability must be such as to incapacitate him from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support, yet the act recognizes differences in the degree of such pensionable disability, giving $12 per month in case of the greatest and $6 per month in case of the lowest degree of such pensionable disability rendering the claimant unable to earn a support by manual labor. It also provides for intermediate ratings proportioned for the intermediate degrees of such pensionable disability. The proper ratings under this act will therefore be made in accordance with such rules for rating as the medical referee shall prescribe, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Under former practice if an invalid applicant for pension was found upon examination to be suffering from two or more disabilities, the aggregate of which would entitle him to the rating of $6, $8, $10, or $12 per month under said act, according to the degree of the total of his disability, under order 225 a claimant's disabilities were no longer considered collectively, but each separate one was looked upon as though each one existed in different persons, and unless one of the disabilities was equal to the minimum rate fixed by law, the whole claim was rejected upon the ground of no disability. This rule still remains in practical effect, although it is claimed that there have been modifications in the practice. Under date of July 12, 1899, in discussing an appeal case where this order came under consideration, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior said:

Order 164 was an extremely liberal construction of the law as to rating under the act of June 27, 1890; indeed, it could not be consistently maintained when the terms of the act were compared with former laws. On the other hand, order 225, as put into effect and as formerly construed, went to the other extreme and in many cases resulted in great injustice to claimants.

Concluding, he uses these significant words:

It will be observed that in the last clause of order 225 the question of rating is left largely at the discretion of the medical referee, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

As already indicated, much depends upon the construction given to the law and the order (225) now in force. It should be borne in mind that the average age of the surviving soldiers who were in the war of the rebellion is 60 years or upward. It is not an unreasonable presumption that nearly all are in some degree mentally or physically disabled. The spirit of the law and the circumstances attending its enactment certainly warrant the conclusion that a liberal interpretation should be given and relief granted, at least at the minimum rate, if an appreciable disability which impairs ability for self-support by manual labor is shown to exist.

Order 164 was issued soon after the enactment of the law of June 27, 1890, and was in harmony with the law. It is conceded to have been, as the Secretary says, "an extremely liberal construction," but not more so than, as he says, "the circumstances at tending its enactment certainly warrant." The boys in blue did not measure their voluntary service by fractions, but offered their country a complete unit—their all. They can not now fathom the depths of a complex system of eighteenths and their subdivisions into minor and minute classifications, expressed in words not embraced in the vocabulary employed by them in the stern school of loyalty when the nation's life hung in the balance.

They refuse to accept as conclusive a certificate of perfect health from a board of review sitting at the national capital, while they are suffering from inflamed muscles, impaired sight, dulled hearing, fast-stiffening joints, and restricted pulsations of the heart which once sent the life currents swiftly coursing through their patriotic bodies as they kept step to the music of the Union.

The law of 1890 does not require that the disability shall be traced to something that occurred to the soldier while in service. It asks:

1. Did he serve in the war of the rebellion for at least ninety days?
2. Was he honorably discharged?
3. Is he suffering from a mental or a physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of his own vicious habits, which incapacitates him from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support?

If his proof makes answer "yes" to each and all of these questions, his name ought to go upon the pension roll.

The manifest purpose of this law is to place upon the pension roll disabled soldiers whose disability is of a permanent character, provided they served the statutory time, were honorably discharged, and did not, by vicious habits, contribute to the disability.

And yet under and by virtue of the rules promulgated in the Pension Department, unless there is some one deficiency that incapacitates the claimant from earning a support by manual labor, he can not be granted his earned pension.

I ask you are these rules fair and just? Every member of this House who has a soldier constituency has met in his own experience, again and again, flagrant malversation of justice in the conduct of pension cases. Why, they will refuse a pension to an old soldier who served full three years or more in the war, and received honorable discharge, on the ground that he had some kind of a disease at the hour he entered the service.

Mr. Chairman, the soldier of the United States stands unique in the history of the world. The records of the ages show us no such sacrifices, no such devotion, no such love of country, and no such heroic achievement as the history of the American soldiery presents. Other nations have their troops "bred in camps and inured to arms," who fight for glory or for pay and whose whole lives are devoted to military careers. Their government's rear lofty monuments of bronze and stone to their memory and provide material support for the declining years of the veterans and those dependent upon them, their widows and orphans; but here, in this land of liberty and freedom, made so by the heroism of her soldiers from the plow and the plane, from the machine and from the pen, from store, office, and shop, at danger's cry our citizen soldiers leap in quick response and go forth unhesitatingly to do and dare and die in their country's defense; and when the warfare is ended, victory attained, they return to the quiet avocations of peace, hoping, expecting confidently and as a right that the memory of their sacrifices will forever endure in the hearts of grateful countrymen.

But how does that country reward him? Scarce a generation passes by and the veteran is forgotten; discriminated against by the Weather Bureau, part of his meager pension confiscated at Soldiers' Homes, rules created in the Pension Department to deprive him of his due meed and reward. I am now looking the honest Speaker in the eye—a man who wears the crown of glory as a soldier and makes me love him for the service rendered to his country—and yet they would say to him: "You can not be pensioned because you had this disease when you entered the service," while this Government compels him to undertake an examination before passing him and giving him a place upon the rolls. And if he had not served he would have been marked as a deserter at the time.

Is it fair, is it honest? Is there not enough patriotism, in God's name, upon this floor and upon both sides of this House to reach an equitable and fair understanding for the men of 1861 and 1865? They are now entering into the eventide of life, the shadows gather about them darkly; already stars are out to greet them, and they appeal to us to give them kindly care and action ere they pass into the great unknown.

They are not begging you. I deny the assertion of the gentleman from Tennessee that they are asking charity from you. They ask only what every decent government on God's earth has given the soldier—justice for the services they have rendered. If it had not been for them the flag of my country would not wave over Tennessee; there would be no land of liberty, there would be no United States. I speak in the name of the soldier, and I demand only justice, only decency, only fair play; the same rights and the same privileges that any free citizen has under the law. For them and in their name I demand that they shall have it.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a record taken from a report of the Commissioner of Pensions that I believe ought to go under the eye of every soldier in these United States; and I trust that no friend of the soldier will object to my printing it at the end of my remarks.

Mr. RAY of New York. What is the paper?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to print the paper in the RECORD?

Mr. RAY of New York. Before that consent is given I desire to know what that paper is.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. It is a comment by a soldier upon the Pension Commissioner's report, giving certain figures from that report and showing by what means these constructions have been placed upon the law that prevented the allowing of pensions and suggesting the remedy to make a more beneficial and fair and liberal construction of the law.

The paper referred to is as follows:

JANUARY 15, 1900.

SIR: As you are a member of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions and a man whose heart is warm yet for the old soldier, I invite your attention to the conduct of the Bureau of Pensions. My impression is that the administration of said Bureau is not what the people demand.

If you will read the Commissioner's last annual report, you will see by page 11 that all claims pending June 30, 1899, amounted to $77,230; that there is in said Pension Bureau 1,741 clerks, including the honorable Commissioner, but not the clerks and board of appeals in the Secretary of Interior's office.

In the Secretary's office there were about 13,347 appeal cases pending, and from 800 to 1,000 per month being filed. You will further see upon investigation that the board of pension appeals are now more than one year and seven months behind. At the present rate of dispatch it will take some over four years for the Bureau of Pensions to dispose of present cases, even if no more are filed. This is a slow gait, while the claimants for pension are passing away at the rate of 40,000 annually, and four years is a long time for weak and distressed claimants to be looking for and expecting food. Congress appropriated $140,000,000 for payment of pensions for term ending June 30, 1899, and yet the Commissioner of Pensions turned back of this sum about $1,644,947, which would have paid many claimants if their claims had been granted. For some reason this was not done, although claims have been complete for more than two years, and appeal after appeal for action has been made with only silence as the tomb in answer. Now, Mr. NORTON, is this for want of clerical force in the Bureau of Pensions?

May I ask, has Congress by inadvertence failed to provide sufficient number of clerks? Commissioner Raum, I believe, issued about 1,000 certificates of pension each working day, while the present can only get out about 1,400 to 1,700 a week. Raum had about 2,000 clerks, but just think of the vast difference in the work now and then. Raum had hundreds of thousands more claims to handle a year than the present Commissioner. Why is this so? With civil-service clerks in the Bureau, as at present, they ought to accomplish a great deal more work.

This delay is either the fault of the Commissioner, of Congress, or the laws, and I do not believe that it is the laws or Congress, but an unreasonable interpretation of the acts of Congress—too much construction, too much strained technicalities, and not enough of practical business sense. As claims should be decided on merit and justice, there should be satisfactory evidence; but pensions to soldiers, except service pensions, should be granted for disability and not on some theory of a name. If the claims are just they should be promptly paid, if unjust under the law they should be as promptly refused, and not delayed for years and then rejected.

They should not be held up if the evidence is all that the claimant desires to present. There is a class of claims which has been held up by the Commissioner by his recommendations or upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior for a year or more. I can not give the exact date. These claims are called "minors' claims," where the application for pension was not made until the minor was over 16 years of age, as though the statute of limitations ought to bar a minor. They are soldiers' children and orphans just the same, and the delay has not injured the United States because no guardian was appointed or the guardian failed to make application while the minor was under 16 years of age. Many minors have been paid pensions when 16 and since they were over 16 years of age. Is it right now to so construe the law after the practice of paying such pensions for thirty years? Who has done this holding up? I can not conceive its purpose, unless it was to establish a record for economy and to starve the veterans' children.

I want to call your attention to another question which will bear great cogitation. Congress appropriated $400,000 for special examiners in the field. There was paid out $35,443.14 for expenses alone. Now, what were the salaries of these special examiners, of whom there were 244? I suppose about $2,000 per head, making a total of $488,000 for salaries, which, added to their expense account, will give $523,443.14. This is an enormous amount. At $100 a year it would pension over 8,754 widows or veterans. Former Congresses have gone to the extent of half a million of dollars, and yet no special examiner seems to be sent into the field until a claimant to pension has made out, by good and sufficient evidence, enough to establish a prima facie case. On page 70 of Commissioner Evans's report, year ending June 30, 1899, you will find interesting reading in connection with this.

Now, if what the Commissioner says on page 44 of that report is true, there is absolutely no need of this useless expenditure of $375,443.14 per annum; but is it true? He says, "The laws are generous; the interpretation of the laws by the Department have always been to liberalize, and the administration of the laws by the Bureau officials has been, and is now, under the established practice, far more liberal than the generous laws, always giving the benefit of the doubt in favor of the soldier."

He further says, "No new rules of evidence have been introduced." If these two things are true, why does he need 244 special examiners to determine the merits of claims, at an annual expense of $375,443.14, claims and facts already proven and admitted? The above does not go to the cases where fraud is charged or suspected. The Commissioner has the power and duty to investigate such cases, outside of this appropriation of $400,000 and the salaries of 244 special examiners.

I believe there are now about 300 of these examiners in the field, all for the declared purpose of aiding claimants to prove their just claims. The whole thing is a farce which ought to be put on the stage, with these men called special examiners the actors. They would draw a full house; and on the tickets might well be printed in large type, "No person need apply for a pension." And yet Congress promised, by pension laws, to give the old veterans pensions as a matter of justice and honor. I do not believe the American people approve the practice of the Bureau of Pensions as shown in the rejection last year of 107,919 claims.

There are, I believe, about 31 homes for disabled veterans, which have cost millions to build and millions to keep up. In them admission is hard to gain, as they are all full of old, disabled, wounded, crippled veterans, while many soldiers' widows, like Christ, have nowhere to lay their heads and appeal to Congress for aid. Why make any distinction in pension laws in reference to a soldier's widow? Give them all the same pension, say, $12 per month, regardless of the military or naval service their husbands were engaged in; then if there should be special cases warranting additional pension, let Congress grant it by special act.

I believe that pensions should be granted to the soldiers for disabilities at the same rate, whether actually contracted in the service or not, unless they were contracted in willful violation of law. Let me refer you to a Treatise on the Practice of the Pension Bureau, Governing the Adjudication of Army and Navy Pensions, 1898, compiled by order of the Commissioner of Pensions. On page 24 of this treatise he hits the nail on the head when he says:

"Although the character of the disease may be such that it still exists, it is the disability therefrom that gives title to pension, and not the fact alone of the mere existence of disease." I claim that this is not the practice of the Bureau of Pensions, because, through the medical referees, they speculate as to names and pathological sequence, and not the extent of disability of the claimant. It is not a theory that confronts us, but a condition. Again, on page 96 thereof, when claimants, under the law of June 27, 1890, have attained the age of 65 years and 75 years, they are entitled to $9 and $12, respectively, although they have no disability other than simply age. This is good sense, not theory, but condition, but when we come to the practice of the Department, the acts of July 14, 1892, and amendments are applied, theory comes in, and not condition, and the age of claimant does not add any reason for any increase of pension and age is no factor in increase or rate of pension. Then, too, a widow's age, dependency, disability, or insanity is no factor. With her it is simply a question of income. This is a harsh rule; it may be good law in the eye of the Commissioner, but it is not justice nor patriotism.

Go back to page 12 of this "Treatise" of the Commissioner and you will find the milk in the cocoanut, and these words: "A claim for pension may be proved by the record evidence only, or by record and parol evidence, but never by parol evidence alone." Here is where, among other statements, 107,919 claims were rejected last year and only 89,064 certificates issued of all kinds and classes. This shows that while all claims must be proven beyond any reasonable doubt, the claimant for pension or increase never has the benefit of the doubt in his favor. The rule on page 122, which says, "Rejected claims can not be reopened after ninety days from rejection," deprives many claimants of just rights, because in many claims, owing to the poverty of the applicants or other reasons, the witnesses which might be had can not be found in ninety days, and the ends of justice are defeated.

I submit my opinion that unless the commissioner is clothed with plenary power there is no pension law giving him authority to make any rule or order.

In Pension Decisions, volume 8, page 5, and again in volume 9, page 218, the Secretary of the Interior discusses the law and says, "Neither the doctrine of res judicata nor stare decisis is strictly applicable to pension cases, and when adopted by the Department simply becomes a rule which each administration prescribes for itself as a matter of policy or convenience, and may be waived, suspended, or ignored, as justice, policy, or convenience requires." So the rule of ninety days after rejection, as applied to having claim reopened, is neither justice nor law.

I call your particular attention to page 25 of the Treatise, and at top of page 28. I suppose he refers to an old rule or a new one. He is speaking of complaints on page 25. His words are, "or when their enforcement would result in unusual delay or denial of pension, the Bureau will aid, by special examination, the claimant, or the Commissioner or one of the Deputy Commissioners will waive or dispense with part of the evidence."

I would like to ask what rule this is, and when was there ever a special examination ordered to "aid the claimant?" And when and where has any essential evidence been waived or dispensed with by the Commissioner or one of his deputies to aid a claimant and prevent unusual delay or prevent the denial of a pension? Does not the Commissioner of Pensions universally deny a pension unless the war records show wound, injury, or disease and the treatment thereof by Army surgeons? Has Mr. Evans or any of his deputies ever waived this Army record and granted a pension to a soldier or his widow? It is often impossible to give any satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner on this question, as he says "it can not be proven by parol;" so where is the claimant given the benefit of a doubt?

In regard to seven years' absence, in the act of March 12, 1896, see Pension Decisions, volume 9, page 590, and volume 10, page 7, 1898, relating to this act. In opposition to this act, the Commissioner has never granted a pension on this seven years' absence, his decisions, I believe, being about in this language: "The absence of the soldier is not explained by evidence which is satisfactory to the Commissioner," although there is a provision in the act which expressly says: "And any pension granted under this act shall cease upon proof that officer or enlisted man is still living."

The rule of the Bureau of Pensions is, that it makes no difference how long a soldier has been a pensioner of the United States, nor how much evidence may be on file with his original claim, if the pensioner departs this life his widow must make the proof over again, which seems to me an unreasonable requirement, to do that which has once been done by the soldier; then the widow must prove that her husband was never married until he married his present widow, or if he was previously married, must show by evidence that his prior wife or wives are dead or divorced, and also prove their legal marriage, even if he had lived forty or fifty years with his present widow. If this is the law, it certainly needs legislation to remedy matters. All these things I have referred to need reformation, and that soon. My old spelling-book says, "Delays are dangerous."

I hope you will concede that I have the right to criticize the acts of public servants intelligently (so far as my ability permits), either favorably or otherwise. I have made these suggestions that you, as a representative of the people and of the many old soldiers in your district, may know to some extent what I, in connection with the thousands of my comrades who are victims of unwarranted and illegal construction of the law, feel in the matter.

You will have the pension question before you in various forms in this the Fifty-sixth Congress, and whether you agree with me or not makes no personal difference to me; but if I have enlightened the issue to any extent or opened the way to a discussion of the question, I shall feel gratified.

I have given you my views on the question of delays in the decision of pension claims and the practice in the Bureau of Pensions, but if you will read the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions and his treatise of 1898, I am confident that you will conclude that some remedy should be found or made whereby pensions should be finally acted upon without from two to a dozen years after a claimant has submitted all evidence asked for or required by law for the adjudication of his claim.

Very respectfully, yours,

Hon. JAMES A. NORTON,
Washington, D. C.

A. Y. T.

Mr. BENTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to protest against the manner in which the Pension Department has treated the veterans of the Spanish-American war.

It has come to my knowledge frequently during the past year that many deserving applications for pensions from soldiers of the Spanish-American war have been denied by the Pension Department.

A short while ago, in conversation with the Pension Commissioner, he informed me that it was the intention of the Department to keep back these claims as long as possible. I remonstrated with him and told him that I thought the men who had gone to the front in the late war, who had, through injuries or sickness received in the service, been incapacitated from manual labor, should receive the recognition they deserve at the hands of the Government.

I repeat here on the floor of this House what I said to him at that time, that the Government is under every obligation, both moral and otherwise, to do these men justice.

I received a letter to-day from a young man who enlisted in one of our Massachusetts regiments who was stricken down with typhoid fever while in Cuba, confined to the hospital there for five months, and this disease took such a hold on his system that he has become a confirmed invalid, incapable of supporting himself or those who are depending upon him.

His application for pension has been before the Department for six months, yet no action has been taken upon the matter.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the report submitted by the chairman of the committee shows that out of a total of 25,000 applications for pensions on account of sickness or injuries resulting from service in the Spanish-American war only 300 have been granted.

I venture to say that the deaths alone of Massachusetts soldiers in this struggle were easily more than this number.

Massachusetts has a glorious record in this war; she sent more men to the front in proportion to her population than any State in the Union, and while they were actuated by the sincerest patriotism and love of flag to perform their duty, yet I do not think if any of them, through wounds or sickness, have become incapacitated and unable to earn a living, the Government is justified in refusing them and those depending upon them the necessary aid.

Mr. Chairman, though not in actual service, I was an eyewitness to many hardships and sufferings of the soldiers here in the camps in the United States.

I was in and about Camp Alger during the greater part of the time that this camp was occupied by the soldiers, and I saw what was going on.

I witnessed men insufficiently fed and clothed and improperly provided with the modern requirements of soldiery.

I saw sick boys—they were not men—compelled to lie for hours on the cold, damp ground, because of a difference of opinion between the division and regimental surgeons.

At Montauk Point, where I lived for three weeks, sleeping in the same tents with the soldier boys that returned from Cuba, I was an eyewitness to scenes of suffering that would melt the heart of the strongest and bravest men.

I saw boys by the hundred unloaded from the transport, start for the detention camp, a mile away, and fall by the roadside from sheer exhaustion and fever.

I saw the beds in the hospital without proper clothing, and I saw many of the wards in charge of incompetent physicians.

In the detention hospital, although before my arrival there were hundreds of cases in the hospitals at the time, there were no nurses except the soldiers themselves, and the first thing that I did after I had noticed this condition of affairs was to see General Wheeler and ask his permission, which was readily granted, to send for a dozen nurses to Boston. These women were on the ground within forty-eight hours, and hundreds of soldiers are alive to-day indebted for their lives to these noble women.

I could occupy the time of this House for hours relating the sad scenes and incidents that I witnessed at Montauk Point, but it is enough for me to state that I do not care to witness such scenes again. The men who enlisted in the Spanish-American war performed their duty, whether in the camps in this country or in Cuba, Puerto Rico, or the Philippines, in a brave and heroic manner. If any of them are unable as a result of that service to support themselves or those depending upon them, it is the duty of the Government to come to their aid.

Mr. Chairman, I warn the Pension Commissioner that he is committing a grave injustice, if not a crime, before the people of this country if he delays even an hour the granting of the just claims of the Spanish-American war veterans.

Mr. BENTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read the following clipping taken from the Evening Star, copied from the New York Journal, which will explain the reason why I asked the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin this morning which I did ask during his speech. I want the attention of the House to the reading of this clipping.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE GREEDY PENSION ATTORNEYS.
[From the New York Journal.]

It has come to pass that no orthodox Congressman can feel easy in the House without offering up a breezy and far-reaching pension bill in behalf of his constituency. By all means, let us give the veterans of our wars their just dues. But for the benefit of the veterans themselves we would call attention to a few facts.

If the pension bills now before Congress are passed the yearly pension list will amount to nearly $350,000,000, not including an arrearage list of $500,000,000 more. We might stand even this, but there are features in several of the new bills that are not founded upon justice. Senator CULLOM, of Illinois, has presented a bill which practically rewards desertion and places deserters on the same footing with deserving veterans. By the provisions of this bill deserters, bounty jumpers, and cowards will be paid $10,000,000 a year by the Government.

As if this were not enough, Mr. LENTZ comes forward with a bill calling for $100,000,000 a year for "general service" pensions to those who do not need aid and have probably never asked for it.

Representative HALL adds to the preposterous list with a bill authorizing the Government to pay over $6,000,000 a year to teamsters in the quartermaster's department during the war—to men who were noncombatants and ran but little more danger than if they had been driving trolley cars up Broadway. There is danger in all this. There is danger that the honest old veteran who now receives a small pension from his country may be called upon to pay much of it back into the Treasury in taxes for the payment of unjust pensions to those who do not deserve them. When will Congress call a halt?

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for one statement?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Is it not a fact that Senator CULLOM introduced that bill by request, and has stated in the public prints that he had not read the bill and that he did not indorse it.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not know anything about that.

Mr. HULL. That is the fact.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, that does not alter the case materially, and in view of the general tendency—

Mr. HULL. I do not think the gentleman would want to do the Senator an injustice.

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, of course not; but I want to say that in view of the general tendency to increase the liberality of the pension laws I only asked the question of gentlemen this morning if it would not be a good time to do away with the Friday night sessions. Now, as is well known by my record in this House, I have never opposed giving a pension to any honest, brave soldier in my judgment who deserved it, and I never expect to oppose any such pension. My contention is that the pension laws on the statute books of the United States are sufficiently liberal for every soldier and soldier's widow who needs it to go to the Bureau with the proper proof and get his or her pension.

Now, in view of the fact that the war is now closed in Cuba and the war is now on in the Philippines, and all the past wars to come in with an increasing pension roll, would it not be well for Congress to call a halt, or at least to do away with the establishment of these Friday night courts here, which can be considered nothing more nor less than appellate courts from the Bureau of Pensions, in order that those who do not deserve pensions may come here and get them and get increase of pensions? The large majority of the bills for special legislation here, as gentlemen know, are for increases and for desertion and for camp followers generally. No doubt there are some deserving cases, and I will always take pleasure in voting for those cases, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact that this pension roll continues to swell and will continue to grow, would it not be well for us to do away with the Friday night sessions? Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, you were a pretty constant attendant during last Congress of the Friday night sessions, and you have repeatedly stated that those bills were to pension deserters, coffee coolers, and bounty jumpers.

Mr. TALBERT. Many of them were. I said I did not say all of them were. The gentleman must not put me in a false light, because I will not be put there. I said there were some few deserving, and that I always took pleasure in voting for those, and always voted against those that I thought were not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will not the gentleman give him time to answer this question?

Mr. TALBERT. Please give me the time.

Mr. BARNEY. I will give the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask you this: Was there a bill, a single bill, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions that came to your knowledge during the last Congress to pension a man who had been a deserter, even by implication, or a man who did not serve and fight in the ranks?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, a number of bills were introduced to remove the charge of desertion, pretendedly, and as soon as the charge of desertion was removed, as a matter of course, the applicant would immediately apply for a pension, notwithstanding the proviso contained in the bill:

Provided, That no pay or emolument shall accrue to the applicant by virtue of this act.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I ask the gentleman if there was ever a bill brought in by the Committee on Invalid Pensions—

Mr. TALBERT. I said bills brought in on Friday nights; and there were other bills brought in here that were not only not meritorious, but outrageous.

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). To pension a man who did not fight with a musket at some time or other?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, we all witnessed the passage of a bill, or at least an effort to pass a bill, for a photographer that never had shouldered a gun, who got shot in the back as he was getting off from the battle of Gettysburg with his pictures and camera [great laughter]; and another man was pensioned for total blindness, when he lost his sight by the bursting of a cannon on some Decoration Day or something of the kind; and I could stand up here for two hours and tell you of numbers of these bills that were passed. That is why I raised my voice against the passage of such bills as that, and I want to say to this House that if you desire to continue such measures at these Friday night sessions you must bring a quorum and do it legally and constitutionally, and then I will say nothing more about it except to oppose unworthy measures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNEY. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman has said, I desire to correct him as to his assertion respecting the character of bills introduced here.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not think and did not say that this bill for the pensioning of a photographer was passed at the last Congress, but at some Friday night session.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman said that a bill was brought in here and passed to pension a photographer. Well, now, that bill was brought into the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and I believe that it was passed.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not confine myself to the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. RAY of New York. In the last Congress—

Mr. TALBERT (continuing). I want to say that the gentleman was just about as fair as he could be, and was like the old Irishman who said if he couldn't be easy he would be as easy as he could. [Laughter.] He was as fair as he could be, and it was because those sessions were largely composed of gentlemen who came here logrolling together, and voting for each other's bills because they wanted their own bills passed; and therefore I was opposed to it, and would do all I could to stop it [laughter], and will continue my opposition to all such iniquities.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BARNEY. Now I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, and not to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BENTON. Am I to understand this time is yielded to the two gentlemen, the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BARNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, all I desire to say in regard to that photographer's bill is that it was reported adversely by the committee in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and all bills of a like character met the same fate; but we did find 650 good bills that became law.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say to the gentleman that frequently he did right. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman is robbing me of my time.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I will not do that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I doubt not, Mr. Chairman, that in this Congress the committee will do its duty, although I have nothing to do with it, and that they can find not only 650 bills, but 1,250 good bills, that should be enacted into law for the benefit of the old soldiers, their widows, and orphans.

Mr. TALBERT. So mote it be. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this Pension Bureau disburses some $140,000,000 annually, and it is very easy to criticize it in a few isolated cases. In this opposition that has grown up during the last year against the Commissioner of Pensions and the Pension Office there is a class of gentlemen at the bottom of it, and I think the time has now come to have something to say in reference to those gentlemen. It is well known that the city of Washington is infested with what is known as pension shark lawyers. They will send their circulars all over the country, send blank applications and a blank power of attorney, and get these claimants, whether they are entitled to a pension or not, to sign and execute these papers and return them.

Then they send them a few blank affidavits, and the whole outfit does not cost them 10 cents. From the time these papers are sent out, it is my experience, and it is the experience of every man who lives in a community where these soldiers live, that they must resort to a lawyer, or to the home of the justice of the peace, or to a notary public, or to that man whom we find in nearly every village who sort of looks after things of that kind for the people, and they execute the papers for them. I will take you to the Pension Office and show you that not one case out of forty do these gentlemen ever put in an affidavit in their own handwriting. I have filled up hundreds of these cases, and I never charged a soldier a dime in my life. When the case is made up, and the member of Congress succeeds in getting favorable action upon it, what do these pension shark attorneys do? They walk up to the Treasury of the United States and take their ten-dollar bill or contract for $25 from these claimants, for which they have never rendered one penny of service except to send out a few blanks.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania pardon me a suggestion right there?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, if you do not use up too much of my time.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want to add to what the gentleman says that after the adjournment of the last Congress I received letters from all over this country, in cases where we had granted special pensions, asking me if the attorneys in the cases were entitled to charge $25, $30, and $50, as they were doing, for work that they had never done and cases they never had anything to do with.

Mr. MAHON. Since I have been in this House I have handled over 3,800 pension cases. I live in a country where war raged for four long years, and in a State that furnished 378,000 men to the Union Army, and in a district that put 25,000 men into it. I have requested the Pension Commissioner, and written to him, not to allow these infamous sharks to take a dollar from the claim after it has been allowed.

Now, this appeal that is made to you is in the interests of these sharks who have been robbing the soldiers of this country. [Applause.] In 1898 the present Commissioner paid out $730,000 of the money awarded the soldiers, of which over two-thirds, or one-half, went to the pension sharks of Washington City. I do not refer to the reputable lawyers. I traced a case in this city to find a pension attorney by the name of McBride, and I found him, on Louisiana avenue, to be an Irish washerwoman. The city is infested with these people, and they have neither office nor desks. Now, during the last year the Commissioner in his report under June 30, 1899, says that he paid them instead of $730,000 only $476,969.61, almost $300,000 less than they had received heretofore, and although more pensions had been granted during 1899. Now, for this speech I expect to receive the compliments of a paper called The National Tribune, which claims to represent the soldiers of this country.

It was these pension sharks, through that paper, that have stirred up the soldiers all over the country, and I am one of the men in favor of passing a law, or putting it into this bill, indorsing the Commissioner of Pensions and providing that these men shall not rob the claimants of the money allowed them by this General Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not put it into this bill?

Mr. MAHON. We have not reached that point yet. I want to say that the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, at their convention held in the city of Philadelphia within the last year, appointed a committee of men who were prominent during the war—and my Comrade NORRIS, from Ohio, knows all about it—and sent them over to the city of Washington.

Pension Commissioner Evans threw open the doors and gave the committee all the information desired, and after a thorough and complete investigation by the representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic in the United States, who represented these men fairly and honestly, the committee went back to that great encampment and made a report that this infamous lie created by these pension sharks was without foundation and without proof. And that great body of the old Army, numbering thousands of delegates, indorsed the Commissioner and said his administration of that office was just and in the interest of the old soldier of the civil war. I am sorry that any member of this House, if there is such, will allow these men to lead him into an attack on the Pension Office.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a paper here, brief and concise, that gives the situation and the business of the Pension Office during the past year. I propose to put it in the RECORD alongside of that of our complaining friends, and when it is printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning, I defy any man, whether Republican, Democrat, or Populist, to read this paper, and then come in here and say that the Commissioner of Pensions has not fully and to the utmost extent discharged the duties of that high office, [Applause.]

The average amount paid annually to each pensioner, invalid, and widow now on the rolls, is $132.74, a magnificent record made by the Congress of the United States. The annual value of the entire pension roll amounts to $131,617,961. I am now speaking of the year just closed, that amount being $649,496 more than has ever been paid out in any single year in the history of the Pension Office.

Notwithstanding this fact, that we have made this large increase over all previous years, still the Pension Department is criticised for its illiberality. I have had under my own supervision and under my own notice cases in which there were hardships, no doubt. In those cases I felt that justice had not been done the claimants, as my friend from Ohio and my friend from Massachusetts have said. But where is there a court in Christendom, where is there a judge, or where is there any tribunal anywhere of which litigants do not complain that they have not had full justice done them? And in this great Bureau, which last year handled over 153,000 cases, why, if a case involving a little hardship now and then did not occur, it would be extraordinary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania three minutes more.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side say, Why not settle these cases at once? I remember when a Democratic Congress opposed an increase in the annual appropriation. I am not complaining of that. Perhaps that is politics; but when we, on this side, are in power, they are always willing on that side to see an increase of pension appropriations. They help to swell the appropriations that will be charged against the Republican party.

But before I close I want to say this in behalf of the old soldiers of the civil war. I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that we can not complain of their want of generosity, and one of the most marvelous spectacles that has ever been seen in a parliamentary body is to see the men whom we met in battle showing this spirit of liberality. I have been here nearly eight years, and in all that time I am free to confess that I never heard a man who served in the Confederate army, and who is upon the floor of this House, criticise the pension policy of the Government. And on behalf of the Union soldier of the North, the East, and the West I say we owe our thanks to the gentlemen on the other side who stand in this position for their generosity in allowing these pensions to go through.

I know there is an occasional critic here. Even my good friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], genial and kind as he is, during the entire session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, even on Friday nights, never raised his voice against a private pension bill. I am informed that he had a contest on hand, and in consideration of his kindness toward the people on our side of the House we permitted him to hold his seat. [Laughter.] I only wish there was a contest on hand now; not for the purpose of putting anybody out, because I would vote to keep them all in, but I wish there was a contest on hand now, so gentlemen would not make some of these speeches against private bills. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken, because during that Congress I opposed more bills than during any other since I have been here, and I am not afraid of any contest, because you can not throw me out, and I will do my duty regardless of consequences.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say to the gentleman that in his efforts to defeat the teamster, the deserter, and the camp robber I am with him heart and hand, and I hope the present Pension Committee will give a black eye to every bill of that kind during the present Congress. I want to say, further, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] has always kept silent on all meritorious bills, but always opposed improper ones.

Mr. TALBERT. I thank you, sir. You are sometimes right.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, with these few remarks I want to ask leave to print a statement which I hold in my hand to append to my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to print a statement in the RECORD in connection with the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BENTON. What is it that the gentleman wants to put in the RECORD?

Mr. MAHON. It is a review of the work of the Pension Office during the last year. It simply presents some facts without any comment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

The annual report of Hon. H. Clay Evans, Commissioner of Pensions, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, will present some very interesting facts in connection with the condition of the pension roll at this time and the operations of the Pension Bureau during the year.

There are now on the rolls the names of 11 surviving widows and daughters of Revolutionary soldiers, as follows:

Name.	Age.	Residence.
Widows.
Ester S. Damon.....	85	Plymouth Union, Vt.
Nancy Jones.....	85	Jonesboro, Tenn.
Rebecca Mayo.....	86	Newbern, Va.
Mary Sneed.....	83	Parkley, Va.
Daughters.
Hannah Newell Barrett.....	90	Boston, Mass.
Susannah Chadwick.....	84	Emporium, Pa.
Sarah C. Hurlburt.....	81	Little Marsh, Pa.
Eliza Sanford.....	80	Bloomfield, N. J.
Ann M. Slaughter.....	80	Mitchell Station, Va.
Rhoda Augusta Thompson.....	78	Woodbury, Conn.
Augusta Fuller.....		Bridgeport, Conn.

WAR OF 1812.

Hiram Cronk, of North Western, N. Y., is the only surviving pensioned soldier of the war of 1812. He is 99 years of age, and he served with the troops from New York.

The number of widows on the rolls, based on service of their husbands in the war of 1812, is 1,995.

INDIAN WARS, 1832 TO 1842.

One thousand six hundred and fifty-six surviving soldiers and 3,899 widows are pensioned, based upon service in the Indian wars.

WAR WITH MEXICO.

For service in the war with Mexico 9,304 surviving soldiers and 8,175 widows of soldiers who served in that war are pensioned.

On June 30, 1898, the total number of pensioners was 993,714
On June 30, 1899, the number was 991,519

Decrease 2,195

During the year there were added to the rolls the names of 40,991 pensioners, and 43,186 names were dropped, of which number 34,345 were dropped by reason of death.

The amount appropriated for the payment of pensions for the year was $140,000,000
Amount paid out by disbursing agencies for pensions. $138,253,923
Amount paid out by Treasury 101,129
138,355,052

Balance in Treasury 1,644,948

The average amount paid annually to each pensioner (invalids and widows) now on the rolls is $132.74, and the annual value of the entire pension roll amounts to $131,817,961, being $649,466 more than it ever was. The average annual value of each class of pensions is higher than last year.

The pension roll is made up of 753,451 surviving soldiers, 297,415 widows and dependent relatives, and 153 army nurses.

The "navy pension fund" yielded only $342,275 for the year, while the total payments on account of navy pensions was $1,683,794.

The payments on account of pensions under the general law for the year were $71,115,703

On account of the war with Spain 28,006
On account of pensions under the act of June 27, 1890. 64,321,460

The number of pensioners residing in foreign countries is 4,306, and the amount paid to them is $63,509.70. Of this number 2,139 are residents of Canada, 415 reside in Ireland, 605 in Germany, and 321 in England.

The amount of first payments on all certificates issued during the year was $2,247,957.75; full amount of fees paid to attorneys, $478,969.61; for the year 1898 it was $730,000.

The total disbursements to army and navy pensioners since 1890 was $2,380,910,974.74

For the same period the following disbursements have been made for the purposes stated, viz:

Fees of examining surgeons $15,490,986
Maintaining pension agencies 12,082,178
Salaries and other expenses of the Pension Bureau 52,237,236

The total number of original applications for pension filed during the year, including those filed on account of the war with Spain, and old wars, was 48,765

The number of original claims allowed during the year was 37,077
Number restored to the rolls 3,914

The rates of pension to soldiers and sailors now on the rolls under the act of June 27, 1890, range as follows:

$6 per month 105,787
$8 per month 128,143
$10 per month 26,540
$12 per month (maximum rate) 160,406

The number of claims of all kinds allowed and in which certificates were issued during the year was as follows:

Old wars 1,559
General laws 20,066
Act of June 27, 1890 58,429

Total allowances 89,054

The total number of pieces of mail handled in the mail division of the Bureau for the year was 5,773,512.

The Army and Navy survivors' division added to the list of survivors of the civil war the names and addresses of 178,906 persons, and furnished the addresses to claimants and others of 223,470 comrades.

On June 30, 1898, there were 635,069 claims pending before the Bureau.

The number of claims of all classes pending on June 30, 1899, was 477,239, a decrease for the year of 157,830 claims.

The number of claimants of all classes, including those based upon service in the war with Spain, who have not received any pension, is 135,641. Excluding army nurses and soldiers of the war with Spain, there are only 69,468 soldier claimants who have not yet been pensioned.

Of the number of pending claims, 305,042 are claims in which pension has heretofore been granted and in which an additional allowance or an increase of rate is claimed.

The Commissioner has given the right of way to original claims in which no pension has ever been allowed, deeming it just and proper that such claims should have the preference.

The number of claims based upon service in the war with Spain filed during the year was 17,560, and during the same period 303 claims of this class were allowed.

Since April 1, 1897, the Commissioner has reinstated in the Bureau 157 and in the agencies 23 ex-Union soldiers or sailors, making 180 in all. During the same period there have been promoted in the Bureau 287 and in the different agencies 29 ex-Union soldiers or sailors.

The law which provides that preference shall be given to ex-Union soldiers and sailors in employment has been strictly observed in the Bureau.

Considerable progress has been made in bringing up the arrears of work in the Bureau. The work on original claims is practically current, and the work of ordering medical examinations in increase claims is being pushed, so that very little time now elapses between dates of filing and ordering the medical examinations in this class of cases.

The Commissioner reports the work in far better condition than at any time since April, 1897, and it is believed that further progress will be attained by the systems instituted in the different divisions.

The Commissioner calls attention to the fact that order 225, issued June 9, 1893, which provided for a readjustment of rates of pensions previously granted under the operations of order No. 164, is still in force, but he states that no revision of rates under said order has been made under his administration.

During the year 107,919 claims of all classes were rejected in the Bureau. A careful analysis of the causes of rejection of so many claims is given, showing that a large percentage of rejections occur in claims for increase, new disabilities, and other claims in which additional allowance of some kind is claimed.

A full and detailed explanation as to the causes of delay in the adjudication of claims is presented, from which it appears that in nearly every case of unusual delay the fault lies with claimants or their attorneys and not with the Bureau.

Complaints have been made against the Bureau for the stoppage of the pensions of those who enlisted or accepted commissions in the war with Spain. These pensions ceased by operation of law and not by any order or instructions from the Bureau.

Up to this date the number of reenlistments of pensioners for service in the war with Spain has been reported as 13 of the Navy, 44 of the Regular Army, and 66 of the war of the rebellion.

Out of 4,941 cases in which action has been taken by the Department in appeals from the action of the Bureau, the Bureau was reversed in 371, and many of these were cases in which the adverse action had been taken before April, 1897.

One thousand one hundred and thirty-seven claims have been filed under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1890, which provides that one-half of the soldier's pension shall be paid to his wife or minor children in cases of abandonment and other specified conditions.

Fiscal year ended June 30, 1899.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, whether this body is in favor of a liberal pension system or interested in economy in public expenditures, there is one platform upon which we ought to be able to agree, and that is that neither economy nor justice to pensioners now upon the rolls can be promoted by the war which is being carried on in the Philippine Islands. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I know that gentlemen laugh, I know that men who have served in the Senate of the United States and elsewhere with distinction and honor for many years, who venture to oppose this policy, are denounced as traitors and accused of prolonging the hostilities in those unhappy islands.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, it matters not to me what they say. I am answerable to my constituents for my views upon this floor. But there was a time when kind words were said in this country for Pitt, for Burke, for Chatham, and for Fox, who denounced the war in progress when our forefathers were fighting for their liberty. Later on, Mr. Chairman, when the Mexican war was in progress, Mr. Lincoln, whose name is revered by every man upon that side of the House and on this side of the House and throughout the country, was a member of Congress. I read from Holland's Life of Lincoln:

The opposition in this Congress were placed in a very difficult and perplexing position. They hated the war; they believed it to have been unnecessarily begun by the act of the United States, and not by the act of Mexico; they were accused of being treacherous to the cause and honor of the country because they opposed the war in which the country was engaged; they felt obliged to vote supplies to the Army because it would have been inhuman to do otherwise, yet this act was seized upon by the President to show that his position touching the war was sustained by them; they felt compelled to condemn the Commander in Chief of the armies, sitting in the White House, and to vote thanks to the generals who had successfully executed his orders in the field.

How history repeats itself. In many respects the situation then was not unlike the situation now, so far as the men are concerned who venture to criticize the war begun and carried on by this Administration without constitutional right or authority. How stood Mr. Lincoln in that crucial period of his country's history? His biographer, Holland, says:

Mr. Polk, at that time the President of the United States, was evidently anxious to justify the war which he had commenced against Mexico, and to vindicate his own action before the American people, if not before his own judgment and conscience. His messages to Congress were burdened with this effort, and Mr. Lincoln had hardly become wonted to his seat when he made an unsuccessful effort to bring the President to a statement of facts, upon which Congress and the country might either verify or falsify his broad and general asseverations. On the 23d of December he introduced a series of resolutions which, had they been adopted, would have given the President an opportunity to furnish the grounds of his allegations and set himself right before the nation.

Mr. BALL. The Congress and Mr. Lincoln expressed themselves in strong terms by a joint resolution condemning the President.

Referring to votes cast by Mr. Lincoln, Holland says:

Indeed, on the very day which saw these votes recorded he had an opportunity to vote that the war "was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally begun by the President of the United States," in company with nearly all the Whig members of the House, Southern no less than Northern. The same men voted thanks to General Taylor for his brilliant achievements in the war.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the debate which followed Mr. Lincoln criticised in the severest terms not only the bringing on and conduct of the war, but the President's motives and purposes.

We have progressed since then. It is treason now to do what Mr. Lincoln did. If we are traitors, was not he? In the same Congress Mr. Lincoln on the 12th of January made a great speech, from which I quote.

Mr. Lincoln spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, some, if not all, of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who have addressed the committee within the last two days have spoken rather complainingly, if I have rightly understood them, of the vote given a week or ten days ago declaring that the war with Mexico was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced by the President. I admit that such a vote should not be given in mere party wantonness, and that the one given is justly censurable, if it have no other or better foundation. I am one of those who joined in that vote and did so under my best impression of the truth of the case.

Now, sir, for the purpose of obtaining the very best evidence as to whether Texas had actually carried her revolution to the place where the hostilities of the present war commenced, let the President answer the interrogatories I proposed, as before mentioned, or some other similar ones. Let him answer fully, fairly, and candidly. Let him answer with facts, and not with arguments. Let him remember he sits where Washington sat; and, so remembering, let him answer as Washington would answer. As a nation should not, and the Almighty will not, be evaded, so let him attempt no evasion, no equivocation. And if, so answering, he can show that the soil was ours where the first blood of the war was shed, that it was not within an inhabited country, or if within such, that the inhabitants had submitted themselves to the civil authority of Texas or of the United States, and that the same is true of the site of Fort Brown, then I am with him for his justification.

In that case I shall be most happy to reverse the vote I gave the other day. I have a selfish motive for desiring that the President may do this. I expect to give some votes in connection with the war, which, without his so doing, will be of doubtful propriety in my own judgment, but which will be free from the doubt if he does so. But if he can not or will not do this—if, on any pretense or no pretense, he shall refuse or omit it—then I shall be fully convinced, of what I more than suspect already, that he is deeply conscious of being in the wrong; that he feels the blood of this war, like the blood of Abel, is crying to heaven against him; that he ordered General Taylor into the midst of a peaceful Mexican settlement purposely to bring on a war; that originally having some strong motive—what I will not stop now to give my opinion concerning—to involve the two countries in a war, and trusting to escape scrutiny by fixing the public gaze upon the exceeding brightness of military glory—that attractive rainbow that rises in showers of blood; that serpent's eye that charms to destroy—he plunged into it, and has swept on and on, till, disappointed in his calculation of the ease with which Mexico might be subdued, he now finds himself he knows not where. How like the half insane mumbling of a fevered dream is the whole war part of the late message.

Following this scathing denunciation of the President, Mr. Lincoln ventured to suggest his conception of the then President's state of mind, which may not be inapplicable to the situation of our present Executive:

He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show that there is not something about his conscience more painful than all his mental perplexities.

In the same speech, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Lincoln gave expression to his ideas of a people's right to their liberties, which, uttered now by those of us who believe them true, would subject us to criticism as furnishing encouragement to Aguinaldo and his men. I therefore let Mr. Lincoln speak, and should his language find response in the hearts of the Filipinos and encourage them to further effort, let the responsibility rest upon the great father of the Republican party, Mr. Lincoln, who said:

Any people anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing government and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable, a most sacred right—a right which we hope and believe is to liberate the world. Nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can may revolutionize and make their own of so much of the territory as they inhabit.

Mr. BENTON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ].

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I favor and shall continue to urge and vote for a liberal and generous interpretation of such pension laws as are now on the books, and I favor additional laws and at this time want to bring to the attention of this Congress a fact which others probably have met with, and which is happening entirely too often in my district and in other districts. A young man entered the civil war without the consent of his parents, at an age at which he had no right to go into the service.

He served a few weeks and was taken out of the service, and as soon as he was old enough he again enlisted and served for three years and then received an honorable discharge, having, however, marked up against him on his record as a minor the word "Deserter." He drew a pension notwithstanding that fact, and died about two years ago. His widow is before the Pension Department asking a pension, and throughout all these miserable months the Pension Department has held that widow at bay, saying that this record of desertion against her husband prevents them from granting it.

Now, it seems to me that if there were a liberal and generous interpretation of the pension laws, or even a technical interpretation, such cases as this would be followed with an immediate allowance of the widow's pension. Suppose the minors had signed a promissory note, the court would have said, "It is null and void and of no effect." So I say they should have given the widow a pension in this case at once. The first enlistment was void from the beginning, and hence no charge of desertion should be considered or entertained. The fact that he was marked as a deserter when he was a minor should not bar her from a pension, and it ought to be sufficient for her to prove that fact alone. As soon as he became old enough he went into the service, served his full term of three years, and received an honorable discharge, which ought in itself to be all the evidence required at the Pension Department. There is neither a liberal nor generous construction at the Pension Department in cases like this nor in many others.

It seems to me that in this case there is absolutely a misconstruction of the law, and we ought to have legislation, either in connection with this bill or as soon as possible thereafter, providing that this widow and all widows shall go at once upon the pension roll where there has been a pension granted to the husband. There is no good reason why many of them, dependent as they are, should have to wait until Congress can pass a special bill in their behalf. The mere fact that the husband has been on the pension list ought to be sufficient, and the widow's pension should begin at once upon the death of her husband if he was on the pension roll at that time. I for one fail to see why any such construction should be put upon the pension law as has been in this case and many others against widows.

The death of the husband of course means a funeral, means funeral expenses, means a readjustment and an entirely different mode of living in many, many homes. It generally means a widow and dependent children; and if there ever is an hour when the family of an old soldier deserves consideration, it is immediately after the funeral; and I propose at the earliest opportunity to introduce a bill and in it provide that where a pensioner dies leaving a widow, the widow shall go at once upon the pension roll and there continue until a proper showing has been made why she should be stricken from the pension roll; and of the purpose to strike her name from the pension roll due and ample notice should be given her, so that she shall have an opportunity to make a showing why she is entitled to have her name remain.

Within the next ten years that Old Reaper called "Death" will mow down the old soldiers with his scythe faster than the swords and guns did in the civil war, and I for one am unwilling to see bills coming to the House by the thousands asking for relief for soldiers and soldiers' widows and those bills held up and never disposed of from term to term.

Let us have general laws to cover these thousands of meritorious cases that are now before Congress, but will probably never be reached, because we are devoting all of our time in these days of colonialism and imperialism to minding the business of people on the other side of the earth, rather than legislating in behalf of our own family at home.

It is for this reason that I have introduced the service-pension bill, and I take peculiar pleasure and pride in the fact that my bill stands as No. 11 among the several thousand bills already introduced in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and I do not propose to allow it to be forgotten that this bill was introduced on the first day of this Congress, and that it is entitled to an early consideration. I am aware that there is a disposition to ignore pension legislation, but if there ever was a time when a service-pension bill ought to be passed this is the session for that work.

I have observed that some on this floor are quite free in their criticism of the pension attorneys, but it seems to me that that is rather an evasion of the issue. If the Government paid the old soldiers the pensions due them under the laws as they now stand on the books, or had adjusted the claims, of which there are more than 600,000 on file and undisposed of, there might be some reason for complaining that the old soldiers have become impatient and are searching right and left for attorneys and politicians and members of the House of Representatives and Senators to help them secure a just and early settlement of that which has been so long due and denied them.

Why should not this Government pay the old soldiers what it owes them under the laws as they now exist, and do it as promptly as private citizens are expected to make settlements with their grocers and their butchers? Why should a man be obliged to wait five, ten, or fifteen years to have a pension claim adjusted and allowed? What right has anyone on this floor to criticize an old soldier for securing the services of a pension attorney and also asking the assistance of a Congressman to secure some little attention to his claim when his own letters are ignored and left unanswered even for a year at a time?

So far as the pension attorneys in my district are concerned, I have no complaint to register against them. I believe they are doing their duty as faithfully as any other class of attorneys. It is possible that some of them may be open to criticism, but in that they are not different from other attorneys, nor even from the physicians, the merchants, and possibly occasionally the preachers. It is human to err, and I have very little patience with the effort made by certain Congressmen to hold up the pension attorney and abuse him, when in fact the fault is really with the administration of the Pension Department.

The time has come when the members of this House ought to put a service-pension law in the statute books and provide for a more prompt and business-like adjustment of pension claims, and in connection with it provide a court of appeals, to which pension claims could be taken and promptly adjudicated. As it is to-day, at least one-half of the time of the Congressmen is taken in doing mere clerical work in connection with pension claims, when that time ought to be given by the members to a more careful study and consideration of the hundreds of millions of dollars that are now being expended annually by the Federal Government, concerning which but very few of us have any time to thoroughly inform ourselves.

Common sense and business sense both suggest that we ought to formulate our pension laws and regulate our Pension Department so that that subject would require less attention from the members of this House and give us an opportunity to save many millions of dollars in the other departments, which might more creditably and more honorably be applied in settlement of the claims of the men who saved the Union and for the time being relieved our Republic from the shame of slavery.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe after the statement of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that if the proof can be made in regard to the allegation which he has made, General Ainsworth will see to it that the charge of desertion is removed from that boy's name. I believe if you have the testimony, you can get justice in that office. That is my observation and experience.

I congratulate my Republican friends on that side of the House that in the beginning of another Presidential canvass they have found a scapegoat on this pension question. I felicitate the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Republican party in laying the whole trouble on the pension attorneys. I know that he is found somewhat an obstreperous animal. He gives us all more or less annoyance, and he gives you an excuse to defend your Administration. I thought some two or three years ago we had escaped him, when there was a rule made that we were not to call up cases on the invitation of pension attorneys. But he was too smart for that. He prepared the letter and directed the applicant to direct it to the Congressman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I in a humble way represent a class of men that are getting scarce in this country. There are a hundred and seventy-odd men on this side of the House, and of them there are 23 of us who represented a cause whose flag has long since been rolled up and put away forever. In a humble way I represent a class of men who never undertook at any time to break down and destroy the Federal Government of the United States, but a class of men who believed they could establish a government that would suit them better.

The armies of the Union, under the flag of the Union, successfully prevented the establishment of the Confederacy, and we came back into the Union and have become a part of it, and we are here to-day; and for those men, not only who are here on the floor, but for the thousands who are at home, I may be permitted to say that for thirty-odd years those men have gone on as best they could, some of them maimed and halt, most of them poor and needy, a great many of them without friends who were able to help them.

These men who came home from the battlefields after the war to find chimneys without houses, to find their farms and fences destroyed; those men who had once been used to ease and comfort came to despoiled homes. They did not lie down amid the ashes of despair and weep; but, on the contrary, gentlemen, they turned their backs to the moonlight of the past and their faces to the sunlight of the future. They vigorously took up life's labor.

They have steadily gone on to earn themselves a living; and though it has been thirty-odd years, I have yet to find a single Confederate soldier of the line ever complain, not only that he gets no pension from the Government, but has never complained at paying his part of the taxes that go to make up pensions for the soldiers of the Union. [Applause on the Republican side.] These old Confederate soldiers have long ago built up the waste places of the South, and they have as honorable records in peace as they made in war. [Applause on both sides.] The old Confederate stands in the front rank in every community where he lives. He is honest, faithful, and true. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we had just as well come to see what we are up against. We not only have on the pension rolls pensioners to pay whose pensions are close to $145,000,000 this year, but the Commissioner of Pensions tells us that he has 26,000 applications on account of the Spanish-American war.

It is no use for gentlemen on that side to lay the whole blame for tardy work on the Commissioner. He is under the Secretary, and is only an underofficer of the Administration. If pensions are delayed and claims rejected that should be allowed, lay the blame where it belongs—to the Administration.

Of course these Spanish war claims are being added to every day by soldiers returned from the Philippine Islands, and they will continue to increase. The amount of money paid out for pensions this year is not $140,000,000, but it is certain the amount of money which we appropriated in this bill will be used and probably more.

First, because the number of persons who will be added to the roll on account of the increase of widows and orphans will keep up the amount of money to the present sum, so that by the death of soldiers we will hardly gain anything for the Treasury. Then, in addition to that, the pensions of soldiers of the Spanish-American war, in my opinion, will run the sum up to $144,000,000.

Another thing; a bill has passed the Senate of the United States, and will inevitably pass the House, to pension widows whose income is not over $250 by their own exertion. Also in that same bill is a provision to permit the Pension Office to take the disabilities and cumulate them, so that the applicant can draw a pension.

When this bill passes it will, in my opinion, add from one to two million dollars a year; so that while we are under the law that we are it is idle and useless for gentlemen to criticise the pension action. My own opinion is that in the effort to keep down the pensions within the appropriations each year the Pension Office does not work with the rapidity and zeal it ought.

There is another thing that I have never been able to understand—and I know a good deal about the pension business, because I have a number of pension claims and I harass that office frequently—and that is, that the law indicates clearly, to my mind, that a man shall be pensioned from the date of his application if the testimony shows that at the date of the application he had the ailment for which he asks to be pensioned.

Mr. RAY of New York. Not exactly that, if the gentleman will pardon me, but if at the time of filing the application he had a disability to a pensionable degree.

Mr. BENTON. Yes; if he was pensionable at all. I believe that that law has not been carried out during this Administration, nor by the last. Pensioners are frequently called upon to go before the board and a pension is granted, usually at the smallest amount, and it does not date back to the application in any case that I have ever had.

Now, a word about the private pension bills. Complaints have been made by my friend on this side of the House about some pension bill having been granted that ought not to have been granted. I do not know about that. I was of the opinion that the Invalid Pensions Committee, under the lead of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], was exceedingly careful, if not stingy, during the Fifty-fifth Congress. I did not learn until late in that Congress that I myself must pick out one or two bills and try to get them through.

I introduced something like twenty bills. I came within an ace of getting one through. Just about two days before Congress adjourned an affidavit which the chairman required me to get was forthcoming, and I am sure that the gentleman from New York would have reported the bill favorably for that widow if Congress had not expired. So I came within one of getting one pension bill passed out of the twenty I introduced. Now, if other gentlemen did not do any better than I did, the complaint they would have was that the Pension Committee was not liberal enough for them.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there for the benefit of the House?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Speaking about the requirements of the committee that gentlemen of the House should point out the bills they want considered, we had referred to our committee somewhere between five and six thousand bills. It was not within the possibility for us to take up the bills and examine their merits and look through them, and therefore we had to ask members of the House to call to our attention the bills they wanted considered first. So no one could complain of that action.

Mr. BENTON. Now, gentlemen, I have not very much more to say, except this: The amount which your subcommittee found has been added—a very small amount—to what was suggested by the Department. The Commissioner of Pensions came before the subcommittee and insisted upon having $15,000 for the use of the pension agencies throughout the country. I readily voted for that, for I did not want the office here to have any sort of excuse for saying that Congress refused to give them a clerical force sufficient to transact the business of the office.

Now, I am not going to fall over myself against the allowance of pensions, for as long as we have the laws on the statute books which we have, then, in my opinion, they ought to be fairly construed by the executive officer. I have no doubt, I say to gentlemen on this side of the House, that they are now and then wrong. I am satisfied some men are able to prove more than others. I have seen men getting no pension at all. I have got a number of cases in my own mind which come about in a very unfortunate way.

Under the old law men are required to prove by somebody that the wound occurred in the line of battle or in the line of duty. I have in mind one case where a man was shot and taken to a hospital; while in the hospital he took the smallpox and came out of it deaf. He is not getting any pension. Unfortunately, he could not draw one under the law of 1890 because of the law, and he could not draw one under the law of 1862, for the reason that there is not and has not for twenty-five years been a single man living who knew absolutely that he was shot in the line of duty, although the proof was made—and I think that is a hardship—by a sergeant of another squad that came on him while he was down.

But no comrade was around there, and the Pension Office will not grant him a pension for that reason. There are a number of such hardships. I have no doubt a number of claims are allowed at the Pension Office that are unjust, because of the fact that some men can prove more than others and prove it easier. I know men justly complain who draw six or seven dollars a month for a very small disability that occurred while in the Army, and other men are drawing $12 a month who got sick after the war was long over.

These things look unfair to gentlemen. Let me say to you, the very best thing we can do is to watch and see whether the executive officers of the Government fairly construe the law under which they act.

Now, as far as I am concerned, I am not going to quarrel with anybody, but my judgment is that nothing good can come of criticising these large pension bills. They are not going to grow any smaller for several years, and you will find that in a short time young Congressmen from Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Virginia will clamor just as hard for pensions to the soldiers of the Spanish-American war as will our Republican friends from Iowa, Illinois, and Ohio and Indiana for pensions for the old veterans of the civil war. It is altogether according to how hard you are pressed, and by whom you are surrounded, as to where your heart is on this question. [Applause and laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BARNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have just taken a letter from the post-office, which I wish to read. It is from a widow asking assistance for another. She says:

This is a case of Mrs. —, whose husband died last May. He drew a pension for a few years previous to his death, and she has tried very hard to obtain the widow's pension, but as yet has not succeeded. She is a very worthy woman. Her husband left her with a farm, but no money. She is over 70 years of age, and really needs this.

Now, I have no desire to criticise the Pension Office, and I am not going to do so; but this is simply a type of very many letters which I have received, and I have in mind now the case of a widow in my own town who has property valued at $3,000 by the assessor. It is a little home out in the country. She lives in it herself. She is 70 years or more of age, with absolutely no income whatever. Yet the ownership of this property is charged to her as affording an income greater than any pension that she would receive, and she has been refused a pension by the Pension Office.

I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, not only for my own information, but for the information of the people of my district, whether any legislation is pending which will remove and do away with this injustice, and whether such legislation, if pending, construes the way in which an income is to be figured, and if, for instance, this old widow, 70 years of age, must have her $3,000 home assessed as equivalent to an income of a hundred dollars? If so, where is the money coming from with which she shall pay her taxes and repairs and then have any income whatever left upon which to live? I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if in closing this debate he will not explain what seems to me to be the most difficult subject at present arising in the administration of the pension laws, namely, the question of the construction of a widow's income from property which she may have in her possession?

Mr. WEEKS. Is there not a bill pending to raise it to $250?

Mr. HILL. I do not know. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. I understood from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] and also from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEEKS] that it is proposed to raise the amount to $250 a year. I should like to know if mortgage indebtedness on property owned by a widow is to be deducted from the amount of possible income which might be received?
